UNDERSTANDING CROSS-POLLINATION

Cross pollination refers to the transfer of pollen between flowers of genetically-distinct plants.

For cross-pollinated species at least two different cultivars from the same group must be planted in relatively close proximity for successful pollination and fruit production.

Insects will cross pollinate a fruit tree when other suitable pollinator trees are growing within 450 feet. However, cross pollination may be hampered by cool, rainy weather or the lack of pollinating insects.

FRUIT TREE POLLINATION

Most hardy fruit trees require cross pollination by another cultivar from the same group.

1. APPLE: Require cross pollination for fruit set. All apples, crabapples and applecrabs are closely related and can be used to cross pollinate each other. Ornamental crabapples pollinate fruiting cultivars.
2. APRICOT: Produce more reliably when pollinated by other apricots or Nanking Cherry.
3. CHERRY PLUM: Require cross pollination by another cherry plum cultivar or Sandcherry.
4. PLUM: Require cross pollination by a compatible plum cultivar or native plum species. Hybrid plums may not be cross pollinated by another hybrid plum. Cultivars such as 'Brookgold' (Prunus salicina) and 'Toka' (complex hybrid) can serve as pollinizers for hybrid cultivars such as 'Pembina' and 'Tecumseh'.
5. PEAR: Require cross pollination by another pear cultivar or Ussurian Pear seedling.

SMALL FRUIT POLLINATION

Most hardy fruit shrubs are self-fertile and do not require cross pollination by another cultivar.

1. BLUEBERRY: Many are self-pollinating, however, planting multiple cultivars often results in larger berries and better yields.
2. CHERRY: Self pollinating; only one variety required for fruit production.
3. CURRANT & GOOSEBERRY: Self pollinating; only one variety required for fruit production. However, if currants are grown near gooseberries then yields can be even greater.
4. GRAPE: Many are self-pollinating, however some hybrids (e.g. Minnesota78) have non-viable pollen and require a compatible pollinator for fruit production.
5. HASKAP (HONEYBERRY): Require cross pollination by another cultivar with similar flowering time (page 63).
6. RASPBERRY: Self pollinating; only one variety required for fruit production.
7. SASKATOON: Self pollinating; only one variety required for fruit production
8. SEA BUCKTHORN: Fruiting cultivars require cross pollination by a different cultivar with male flowers
9. STRAWBERRY: Self pollinating; only one variety required for fruit production

HARVESTING FRUIT

Colour, firmness and flavour are useful indicators to determine when fruit are ready to pick.

To determine when apples are ripe, look for the following: (1) green portions of the skin start to turn yellow; (2) seed coats turn brown; (3) flesh changes from tough and pulpy to crisp and juicy; and (4) fruit stem separates from the tree.

Pears should be picked when still firm and somewhat green in colour. If left to tree-ripen, they may turn brown and soft. Plums and apricots may be left on the tree until ready to eat.

These figures provide the pH status of topsoil in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

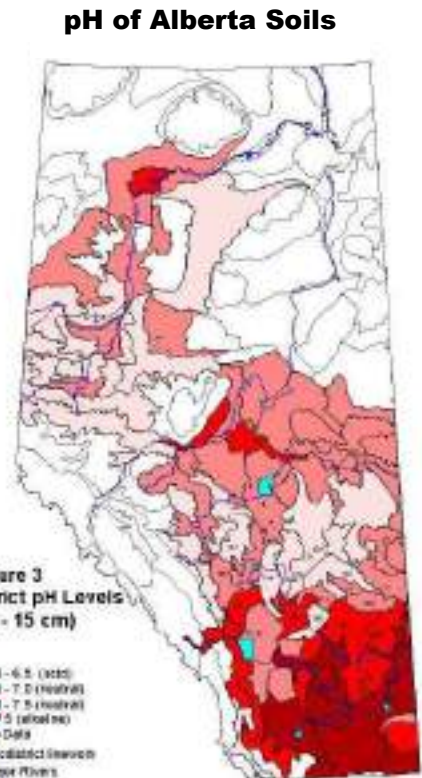

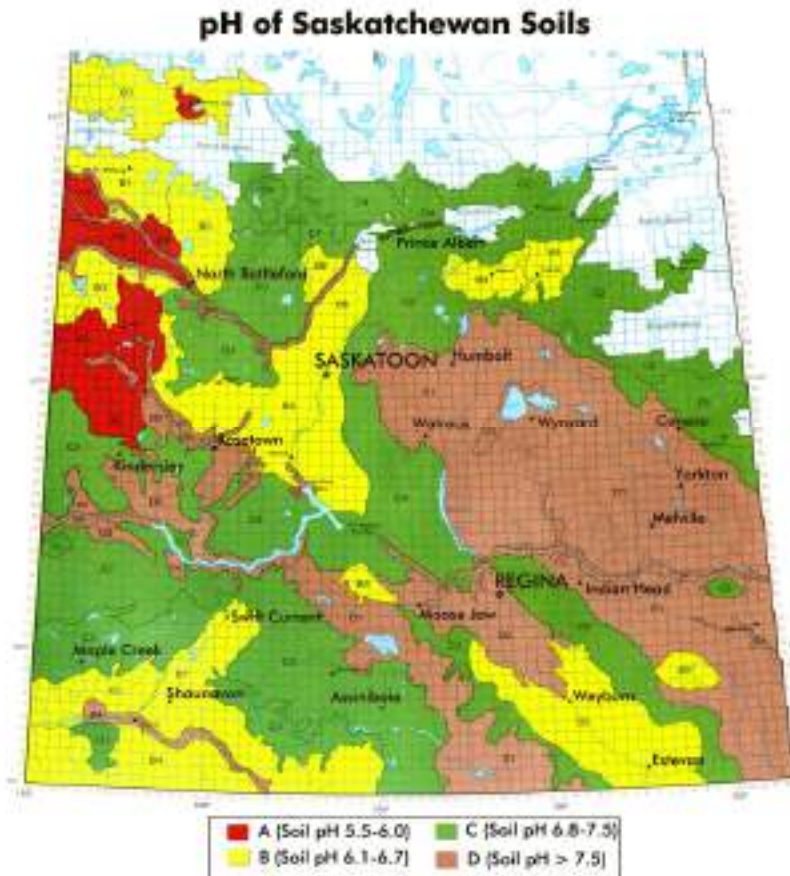

Soil pH is reported as a logarithmic scale so that a single unit change in pH represents a 10-fold difference in conditions.

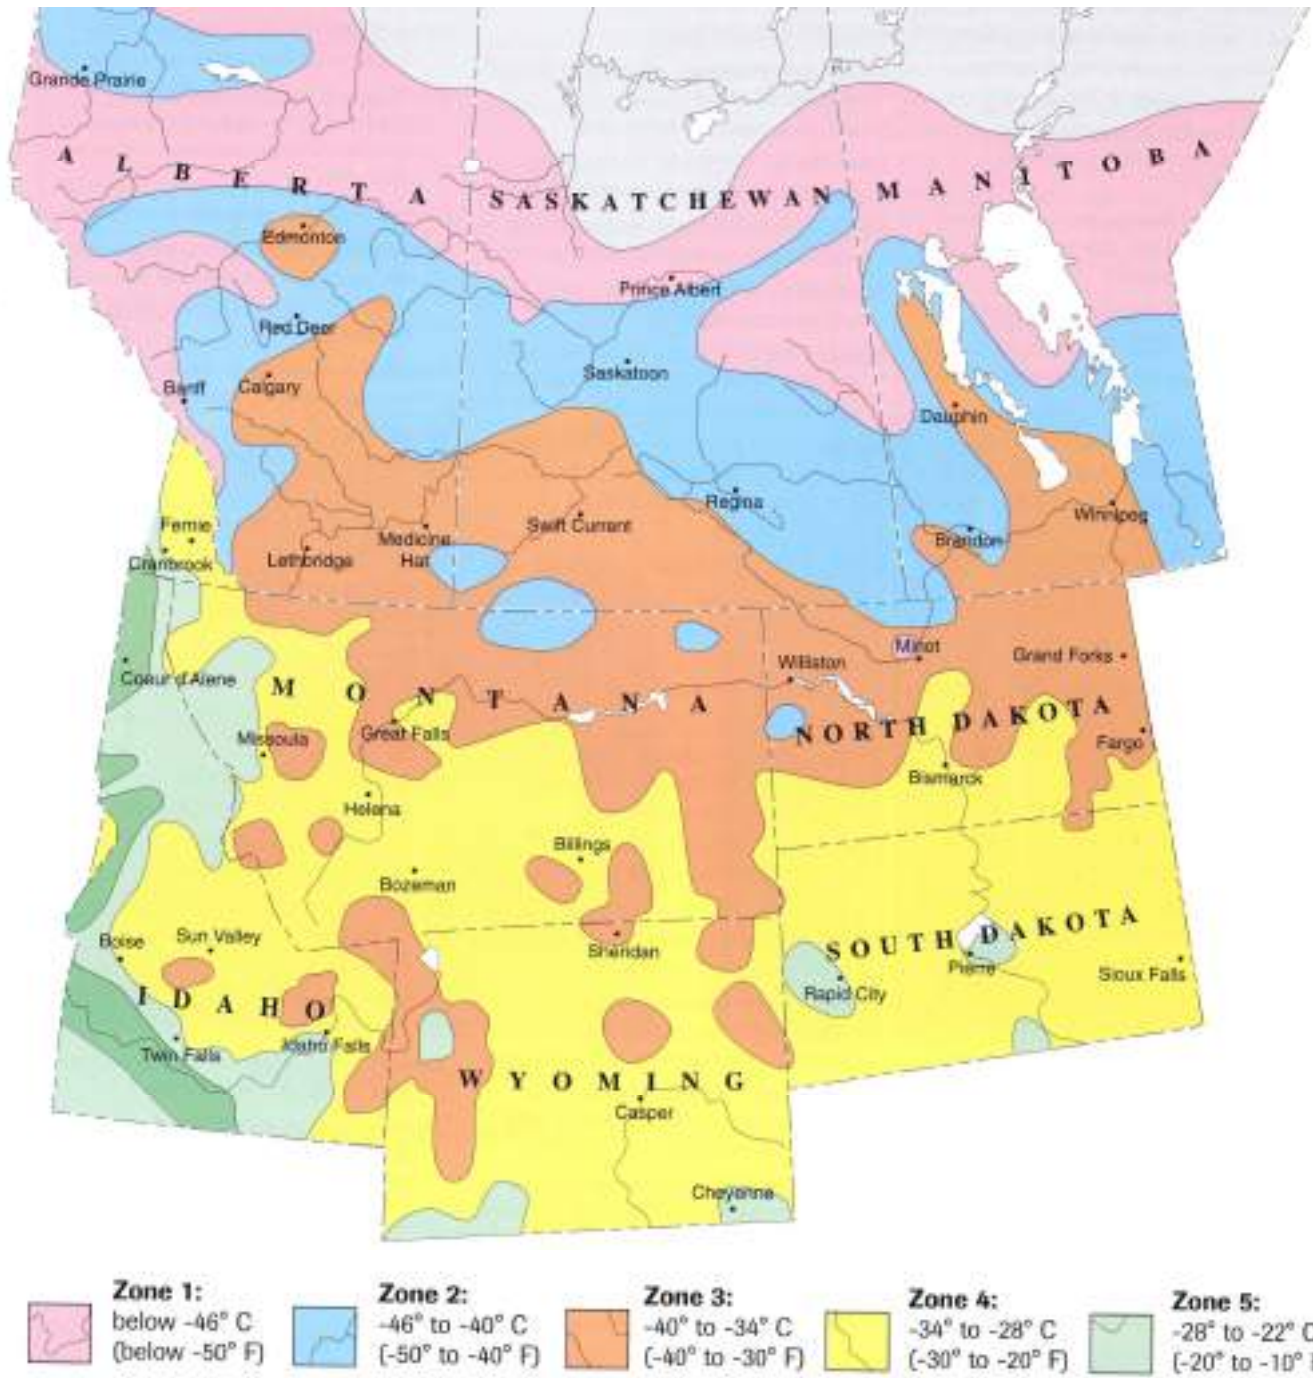

There is considerable variation in soil pH across each province and tree planting lists for communities should be customized with this fact in mind.

The impact of soil pH on tree performance cannot be overstated. At maturity, trees access water and nutrients from a large area of soil and it is very difficult to modify soil pH on this scale.

Plants that are especially sensitive to alkaline pH include the following:

- Amur Maple
- Freeman Maple
- Red Maple
- Blueberry

A zone rating is an attempt to match a plant's survival with a set of environmental conditions. These conditions include minimum winter temperature, frost free period, snow cover, and wind speed. Most zone maps include a list of indicator plant species whose survival depends on certain climatic variables.

Remember that zone ratings are only a guideline for plant selection. Plant survival is also impacted by bodies of water, wind protection, snow cover and urban heat islands. For this reason there will always be trees and shrubs that defy the odds and thrive under conditions very different from their zone rating. Nevertheless, there are limits to this flexibility and in most cases ignoring a plant's zone rating is an invitation for winter damage.

Typical winter damage on woody ornamentals includes winter browning, root injury, tip kill and bole cracking. The absence of snow combined with cold temperatures can have lethal effects on the roots of certain species. It is for this reason that rootstock must be carefully selected even when bud grafting hardy varieties. Ideally, seedling rootstock should be sourced from the harshest conditions in the region where the finished plant will be marketed.

Tip kill and bole cracking are not only related to winter conditions but, more importantly, the onset of those conditions in the fall. Woody plants need adequate time and suitable conditions to set buds and enter dormancy prior to facing extreme cold. For example, an extreme September frost may be more damaging to a Silver Maple than a bitter cold spell in January.

An informed gardener will take note of plant hardiness when making plant selections. However, one should not hesitate to stretch the limits of ornamental species in the landscape through: 1) proper plant placement to take advantage of snow cover and shelter, and 2) careful application of fertilizer so as to allow proper fall shutdown.
