

Forgotten Books

— www.forgottenbooks.com —

Copyright © 2016 FB &c Ltd.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, or transmitted in any form or by any means, including photocopying, recording, or other electronic or mechanical methods, without the prior written permission of the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law.

NARRATIVE

OF A

JOURNEY THROUGH GREECE,

IN 1830.

WITH REMARKS UPON THE ACTUAL STATE OF THE NAVAL AND MILITARY POWER

OF

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

BY

CAPTAIN T. ABERCROMBY TRANT,

AUTHOR OF "TWO YEARS IN AVA."

LONDON:

HENRY COLBURN AND RICHARD BENTLEY,
NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

1830.

LONDON:
PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

P R E F A C E.

So many works have been published lately relative to Greece, that I fear my adding another to the already overstocked list may be considered a superfluous task; but Greece hitherto has only been described as she appeared during the Turkish rule; and whilst her struggle for independence was still undecided, her condition at the termination of an eight years' war is not generally known; and it is in the hope of supplying some information on this point, that I venture to publish the accompanying notes. They are hastily, and, I grieve to say, carelessly written: my absence from England until the present moment having prevented my preparing them properly for the press ; but I hope my readers will bear in mind that I am sensible how open my style is to criticism ; and I only urge in extenuation of my faults, that the circumstances I have narrated are undoubted facts ; and that those incidents which did not come under my own observation are related on the authority of others, in whom I place implicit reliance.

As I am perfectly unconnected with Greece, and Grecian politics, I trust that my remarks upon the President's Government may be considered unprejudiced. I went to Greece rather biased in favour of his proceedings, but a nearer view of his policy dispelled my illusion ; and the manner in which he since succeeded in influencing the decision of the Prince nominated to the throne of Greece, is a proof how deep are his designs.

The remarks upon the Ottoman Army and Navy were drawn from correct sources of information at Constantinople ; and the English were in such high favour with the Turks when

PREFACE.

I was there, that I was enabled to examine several of the public establishments, which had hitherto been closed to strangers.

I cannot conclude these observations without expressing my renewed thanks to many of my countrymen, to whose hospitality I was much indebted during my travels in the East; and although I abstain from mentioning their names, yet I trust that they will not suppose me unmindful of their kindness.

T. A. T.

London, 25th Oct. 1830.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

Chiarenza.—Land at Katacolo.—Pyrgos.—Olympia.—Tripotamia.—Plain of Dara.—Mount Artemesius.—Pass of Portes.—Plain of Argos Page 1

CHAPTER II.

Count J. Capo d'Istrias.—Parties in Greece.—Arrival of the President.—His ambitious views and bad Government.— Counts Viario and John Capo d'Istrias.—Assembly at Argos.
—Greek Oratory.—State of Finances.—Argos.—Hydra.— Spezzia.—Ipsara.—Scio.—Vourla 40

CHAPTER III.

The Cyclades.—Cape Colónna.—Temple of Minerva.—
Ægina.—Tombs.—Palicari.—Orphanotrope.—Museum.—
Temple of Jupiter.—Panhellenium.—Temple of Venus.—
Quarantine.—Prince Demetrius Ypsilanti.—Ipsariot boatmen.—Poros.—Russian squadron.—Greek fleet.—Commerce.
—Damala.—Trœzen 73

CHAPTER IV.

Ruins of Trœzen.—Grove of Æsculapius.—Theatre.—Monastery of Agios Demetrios.—Argos.—The Citadel.—Ancient Theatre.—Temple of the God Cephissus.—Monastery.—Rejoicings on Christmas Day.—Fount of Erasinus.—Marsh of Lerna.—Jocrisse's Cave.—Cyclopiàn Tower.—Ruins of Mycenæ.—Tomb of Agamemnon.—Temple of Juno.—Tiryns 109

CHAPTER V.

Napoli di Romania.—The Palamide. — Colocotroni attacks Griva, and is repulsed.—State of society at Napoli.—Greek ladies.—Deficiency of education.—Greek troops.—Regular forces.—Infantry.—Cavalry.—Pay of the army.—Leave Napoli.—Plain of Argos 140

CHAPTER VI.

Plain of Tripolizza. — Mantinea. — Tripolizza. — Turkish Prisoners. — Concealed wealth. — Battle of Navarino. — We enter Laconia.—Greek marriages.—Source of the Alpheus.—Village of Bruliah. — Sparta. — Mistra. — Logotheti.—The Epiphany.—The Curfew bell.—Ancient marbles at Mistra.—Ruins of Sparta.—Sarcophagus at Cologonia 167

CHAPTER VII.

Ceremony in the Metropolitan Church. — Revenues of the priests. — Present state of the Greek Church. — Mavromichalis, or Petro Bey.—Remarks on the necessity of colonizing Greece. — We leave Mistra. — Cypress-tree at Trupæ.—Fount of the Eurotas. — Sleep at Spanèika. — Londari. — Megalopolis. — Caritena.—Character of Colocotroni.—Temple of Apollo, at Bassæ.—Khan in the plain of Tripolizza.—We reach Argos 203

CHAPTER VIII.

Nomination of Prince Leopold to the Sovereignty.—Disappointment of Capo d'Istrias.—Opinions of the Greeks.—Discussions relative to the Frontiers.—Epidaurus.—Arrival of the Duchess of Plaisance at Ægina.—We proceed to Athens; anchor in the Piræus.—Karaskakai.—Enter Athens.—Bey's Palace 242

CHAPTER IX.

Ruins of Athens.—Monument of Lysicrates.—Temple of Jupiter Olympius.—Fount of Callirhœe.—Temple of Theseus.—The Pnyx.—The Parthenon.—The Erectheion.—Bey of Athens.—Ypsali and Padishah.—The Maid of Athens.—Value of Land.—Sieges of Athens.—Operations of Sir Richard Church.—We sail for Salamis 262

CHAPTER X.

Salamis.—Vasso.—Colouri.—Departure of the President.—Irregular army.—Origin of the Palicari.—Their conduct during the war.—Instances of broken faith.—Marco Botzaris.—Skirmish in Albania.—We leave Salamis, and land at Kenchræ.—Isthmus of Corinth.—American Colony at Hexamilia.—Proceedings of the American Committee.—The Acro-Corinthus.—Corinth.—Sicyon.—Gulf of Corinth.—Pass of Acrata.—Defeat of the Turks 291

CHAPTER XI.

We proceed towards Megaspoleon.—Arrive at the Convent.—Remarks of the Monks upon religion.—The Church.—Picture of the Holy Virgin painted by St. Luke.—Origin

of the Monastery.—Wealth of the Priests—The Library.— Ibrahim repulsed from Megaspoleon.—Vostizza.—Lepanto. — Castles of the Morea and Roumelia. — Patras. — Hadgi Christo's irregular Cavalry.—Society at Patras.—Embark for Zante.—Remarks	322
--	-----

REMARKS on the ACTUAL STATE of the NAVAL and MILITARY POWER of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE	351
--	-----

ILLUSTRATIONS.

ENGRAVINGS.

	Page
Castle of Calavrita*	FRONTISPIECE
Jocrisse's Cave, near Argos	130
View of Mistra	191
Temple of Apollo, at Bassæ	238
Megaspoleon	322
The Dardanelles	433

WOODCUTS.

Harpy	88
Gate of Lions, Mycenæ	135
Torso of a Persian or Caryatides	272

* This should be Castle of Cantena.

NARRATIVE
OF A JOURNEY THROUGH GREECE.

CHAPTER I.

Chiarenza.—Land at Katacolo.—Pyrgos.—Olympia.—Tripotamia.—Plain of Dara.—Mount Artemesius.—Pass of Portes.—Plain of Argos.

THE month of October 1829 had nearly terminated when I embarked in His Majesty's ship Ferret, Captain Hastings, on my way from Corfu to Pyrgos, a small town on the western coast of the Morea, which of late years has been the principal point of communication between the Ionian Islands and Greece; and from thence it was my intention to proceed to Napoli di Romania and Constantinople.

At this moment both Greece and Turkey offered plentiful sources of amusement to the traveller, a nine years' contest having at last restored to the first her independence, whilst the latter, after seeing her Northern enemies at the gates of Istamboul, was, for the first time, undeceived as to her power, and forced to acknowledge that victory had passed away from the standard of Mahomet. To Greece, however, my attention was particularly directed; for not only was I strongly tinctured with a classical enthusiasm for the country which had been the scene of such celebrated deeds in early times, but I also felt anxious to see those sturdy mountaineers who, emulating the fame of their ancestors, had for so many years successfully defied the power of the Porte, and who, whatever may be their failings, deserve much credit for the many sacrifices they made in the cause of liberty. I was however prepared to meet with some difficulties and much inconvenience during my projected tour; and experience proved to me that I was not mistaken.

The day after leaving Corfu, we saw Sta. Maura and the promontory of Leucas, whence Sappho cast herself into the sea; we then passed the rocky island of Ithaca, and ran close to the precipitous shores of Cephalonia, which to the northward are bleak and dreary; but on doubling the western point, the scene improves; groves of olive-trees and whitewashed houses are scattered along the slope of the mountains, and above them rises the black mountain, which is said to be five thousand three hundred feet above the level of the sea: but the most beautiful of the Ionian Islands is Zante; and when I first saw it, I could not but coincide in the remark of a Zantiot who was standing near me, and exclaimed with great fervor—“ Zante! Zante!

Fior di Levante ;”

for such is the attribute bestowed upon it by the Ionians: Corfu, with much less justice, is styled the “ Fior del Mundo.”

In the evening, when the sun set, the view from our ship was delightful. To seaward were Zante, Cephalonia, Ithaca, and Sta. Maura; the bold mountains of Western Greece, Parnassus, Mount Olenos, and the plains of Gastouni, or Elis, occupied the opposite line of the horizon; and to the southward, Cape Katacolo stretched far out to sea, and almost hemmed us within a circle of land; but the bright tints of a Mediterranean evening were wanting to render the scene more characteristic,—already had the heavens assumed the cold hues of winter, and the distant mountains were capped with snow.

On the coast of Greece, one of the most prominent objects was Castel Tornese, an old Venetian fort, now a ruin, but in former days affording protection to the town of Chiarenza, or Clarentza, which by a strange decree of fortune has given the title of Clarence to our Royal Family. It would appear that, at the time when the Latin conquerors of Constantinople divided the Western Empire amongst their leading chieftains, Clarentza, with the district around it, and which comprised almost all of ancient Elis, was formed into a duchy, and fell to the lot of one of the victorious nobles, who transmitted the title and dukedom to his descendants, until the male line failed, and the heiress of Clarence married into the Hainault family. By this union, Philippa, the consort of Edward the Third, became the representative of the Dukes of Clarence; and on this account was Prince Lionel invested with the title, which has since remained in our Royal Family. It is certainly singular that a wretched village in Greece should have bestowed its name upon the British Monarch.

Baffling winds and adverse currents prevent-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

great and virtuous men whose exploits and glorious deeds had been the theme of my early lessons; that this was the country where first civilization dawned upon Europe, and from whence we derived our first lights of science; and that within a few miles of me was the celebrated Olympia, where, in former days, the fiery youth of Greece were seen eagerly contending for the prize, and displaying an emulation which too often ripened into rivalry and hatred: but there was nothing in the scene before me to call forth corresponding ideas, — the country was uncultivated, and apparently uninhabited; I could not see a single house, and, instead of viewing any of the fancied forms of ancient heroes, I perceived a tattered, dirty-looking wretch driving before him three miserable little horses, which I understood were the animals provided for my service; so, after placing my baggage on one, my servant and I mounted the others, and sitting sideways like the Greeks, we commenced our journey.

My servant Theodore, by the by, was a great character in his own way, and seemed quite transported with delight on having again touched the shores of Greece. At the commencement of the Greek Revolution he gave up his place at Corfu, and taking with him what little money he had saved, proceeded to join the Patriot army ; when having levied a few men, and thus transformed himself into a sort of officer, he, according to his own account, spent all his money, fought like Leonidas, and at last, finding that he had no chance of gaining either pay, rank, or even food amongst his kindred warriors, was glad again to become a servant at Corfu. His visit to Greece with me seemed to have revived his warlike feelings, and a couple of human skulls which were whitening on the road-side called forth the remark — “ Ha, Sir ! look at those rascally Turkish heads : the Greeks fight like lions, and shoot the Turks same as lambs.”

The road from Katacolo to Pyrgos is over a plain capable of being profitably cultivated, though now covered with weeds and brambles ; the sea bounds it on the west ; and inland runs a range of rocky hills, where I observed a fortified cavern which had served as a temporary refuge to the inhabitants of an adjacent village, during the inroads of the Turkish cavalry.

A little beyond this we came to the remains of what had once been Pyrgos, but which now merely presented a dreary assemblage of roofless mud walls : the merciless troops of Ibrahim had here deeply imprinted the marks of their talent for destruction, the bare walls of two churches and a half-demolished tower being the only indications that a town formerly stood here.

Pyrgos once contained about four thousand inhabitants, who being mostly Greeks, the town had not experienced any injury from the contests which took place during the four first years of the war; and in 1825 it was in a flourishing state, and had a considerable trade in the small manufactures of the country; but its open and unprotected situation in the plain left it an easy prey to the Arabs, who in the following year reduced it to the state in which I saw it. This was the first proof I remarked of Ibrahim's deadly hatred to the Greeks. I had yet to learn, that from Cape Matapan to the Gulf of Corinth, not a single town had escaped the flames, nor a solitary house remained uninjured.

The inhabitants of Pyrgos, who, during the war, fled to the most inaccessible spots in the mountains, where many perished from the inclemency of the weather and scarcity of food, had now returned and recommenced building their dwellings, and two or three houses and several huts had already arisen amidst the ruins.

To one of the former I was directed, as the residence of Signor Pasqualigo, the British Vice-Consul. All the travellers who had lately visited this part of Greece returned deeply impressed with the beauty of one of his daughters, whose fame appears to vie with that of the maid of Athens of former days. On my approaching the house, a pair of sparkling black eyes, which I saw peeping from behind a window, and the succeeding chatter of female voices, assured me that the lady in question was within; and when I ascended the steps, a very pretty young girl in her national costume, with arched eyebrows, Oriental eyes, and an European complexion, stepped forward to welcome me, in the absence of her father.

Amidst the squalid wretchedness which Pyrgos presented, the apparition of such a pretty person was quite gratifying, and I most cordially subscribed to the received opinion respecting her attractions. Katrina and her sister Euphrosyne having ushered me into the house, and invited me to rest upon the sofa until the arrival of their father, commenced preparing a dinner for me: and when it was ready, they brought it in themselves, and waited at table; not from necessity, for they had many servants, but merely in pursuance of the ancient custom, which appears to have remained firmly rooted in Greece since the days of Homer. A person who is unaccustomed to Greek habits finds these attentions irksome, and feels inclined every moment to request the lady not to give herself any trouble; but when we reflect that, not many centuries since, our noble dames performed almost equally menial offices, and that in the heroic ages even the daughters of kings scrupled not, when fulfilling the sacred rite of hospitality, to wait upon the stranger, we set aside our modern notions of devotion to the weaker sex, and are perhaps not sorry to find that, for once, it is our turn to take the lead. Pretty Katrina had however one great defect in common with her countrywomen; her eyebrows were painted, and her cheeks were rouged; but this is so customary among the Greeks, that they scarcely attempt to disguise it. They perhaps still think, as did the Athenian ladies in the time of Pericles, that they are not dressed unless their countenances are covered with paint. If painting is excusable at any time, it is when people have had a fit of the Morea fever; and this was the case with the Vice-Consul and his family, who were just recovering from the insidious attacks of their annual foe. The marshes between Pyrgos and the sea cause most noxious exhalations, and the wan, sallow complexions of the inhabitants betoken how much they are injured by them; indeed, scarcely any part of the Morea is quite exempt from this curse; and as cultivation and cleanliness are the only remedies for the evil, it is to be feared that many years must elapse ere it is eradicated.

Fresh horses having been brought to the door, I bade the young beauties and their father adieu, and, under the especial guidance of an active young Greek, named Anastasius, and two of his countrymen, resumed my journey over the mountains.

Travelling in Greece is conducted in so different a manner from that of any other country, that a person who does not make up his mind to experience every kind of hardship and annoyance will be much disappointed. Bad horses, a scarcity of food, no inns, and, what is worse, no roads, are only a few of the troubles a traveller has to encounter. Until very lately, he ran the risk of being fired at from behind a tambour, or robbed by some marauding soldiers; and although no danger of this kind is now to be apprehended, the exposure to the extremes of heat and cold—to the burning rays of the sun in a valley, and the piercing blasts of wind on the summit of the mountain, is extremely trying to the constitution. In the space of one hour I have been panting with heat and shivering from cold. At night, with the earth for a bed and his saddle for a pillow, a person feels happy in sharing the fire-side of some peasant, whose filthy mansion he views in the morning with feelings of utter disgust; and when he awakes, and prepares to pursue his journey, he is still heated, feverish, and unrefreshed. In spring and summer travelling is more agreeable, as it is then unnecessary to sleep beneath a roof; but at this time of the year shelter is indispensable. From there being no roads, or at least mere pathways, it is impossible to travel beyond the rate of two or three miles an hour; and thus, after passing the whole day on horseback, a traveller finds that he has not ridden more than twenty or thirty miles; and in winter he will not be able to perform more than half that distance.

My journey from Pyrgos to Napoli will give a tolerable idea of what travelling is, in the present day, in Greece. The sun had nearly set when I rode out of Pyrgos; but time was of importance to me, and I determined to hasten onwards, leaving Olympia and the vale of the Alpheus to the right, and following a path

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

“How!” said the interrogator, affecting surprise,—“have you never been here before,—you who, in your work upon Greece, say that ‘at every step we made, we trampled bronzes and inscriptions under our feet?’”

Bronze helmets have been repeatedly found in the bed of the Alpheus; and I have seen two, which were apparently votive offerings, one of them having the name of the donor (Dionysius) inscribed upon it: they had been purchased here from the peasants for a few piastres.

After leaving Pyrgos, we rode for some hours through an uneven country, until the barking of dogs, and the glimmering of lights amidst the trees, warned us that we were approaching a village, which my guide called Lanzoi. Here it was resolved that we should rest for a few hours, and Anastasius accordingly knocked at the door of a miserable hovel, where we hoped to obtain admittance. An aged couple presented themselves; and by the light of the fire, which blazed in the middle of the tenement, I could perceive that the distrust which was manifested on their countenances did not cease until they ascertained that I was an Englishman; for so shamefully did the armed Greeks tyrannize over the peasants, that they were almost as much dreaded as the enemy. A spot by the fire-side was cleared for my reception, where I spread out my cloak as a bed; and a few eggs having with difficulty been procured in the hamlet, these, with some brown bread, formed my supper. Whilst I ate this, my host and hostess, their daughter, a pretty black-eyed maid, some wild bandit-looking Greeks, with fierce countenances and large black moustachios, and dressed in the Albanian garb, formed a circle round the hearth, and after eliciting from my servant all the information they could respecting me, began to tell their own tales, which related mostly to the events of the last war, and were strongly tinctured with the spirit of exaggeration, or, in other words, lying, for which Greeks both of the olden time and present day have alike been justly famed. One of them declared, that when Ibrahim's troops advanced in this direction, seventy-five Greeks, including himself, had entrenched themselves in a small monastery near the Alpheus, where, for three successive days, they resisted the assaults of seven thousand Arabs, who tried to breach and blow up the walls, but without success! At last, their water having failed at midnight of the fourth day, they formed themselves into a compact body, and, uttering an inspiring hurrah, dashed into the midst of their foes, slew three hundred of them, and succeeded in regaining their mountain-wilds without the loss of one man. Another of my companions, afraid lest his valiant deeds should be unheard of, declared that he one day killed seven Arabs, and had an opportunity of shooting Ibrahim himself, but was afraid to do so, as he must have paid the forfeit of his life. A third then took up the conversation; and so they continued praising themselves, until I was weary of listening. Theodore, who acted as my interpreter, did not fail to remark, when he translated these tales, "You see, Sir, Greeks shoot Turks same as lambs." I certainly thought, that were I to credit all the marvellous feats related to me, I should have some reason to be of his opinion. The poor people with whom I lodged had been considered wealthy, but they were involved in the common ruin of their village, and now had barely sufficient clothes to shield them from the inclemency of the weather; their daughter, a girl of seventeen, must once have been beautiful, but hardship, starvation, and severe work, had bronzed the tints of her cheeks, and destroyed the delicacy of her features. Notwithstanding their fall from affluence to poverty, they were quite cheerful and happy.

To re-occupy their village, after many months' wandering in the mountains or concealment in caves, was comparative bliss; and they hoped by assiduous industry, in a few years, to regain their former state of prosperity. I requited the hospitality of these people with a gift, which, however trifling, far exceeded their expectations. The old man shook me by the hand, and then performing the Greek salutation, by resting his right hand on his heart, wished me happiness and blessings innumerable.

The path we followed in continuation of our journey, ran along the banks of the Nabura, a brawling stream which eventually empties its tributary waters into the Alpheus. On either side rose rocky hills, diversified by shrubs and patches of verdure; and here and there a few oak-trees spread forth their knotty branches in solitary grandeur, or were clustered in beautiful groups, intermixed with the pine, cistus, and dark-leafed cypress. The glen was singularly wild and romantic, and there were no symptoms of habitations near: the only living creature we perceived being a huge wolf, who, when the morning mist cleared up from the valley, was disclosed to our view, on the brink of an overhanging precipice, from which he peered down upon the dale below. We continued gradually ascending the stream until we reached a spot where it was hemmed in by two precipitous rocks, meeting above the river, and forming a natural bridge, below which the torrent rushed at the depth of many fathoms:* the track of a footpath denoted that this singular communication was often crossed by the fearless Arcadian shepherds. Some of the oaks here appeared to have stood unmolested for ages past, and, although winter was fast approaching, were still clad with verdant leaves; the earth, covered with nutritive grass instead of being parched by the heats of summer, was refreshed by numerous rills which trickled down the mountain sides; and when we emerged from the glen, we discerned around us numerous flocks of sheep and goats, tended by shepherds clad in sheepskin capotes, armed with guns, pistols, and ataghan, and attended by stout dogs of a noble race peculiar to this country, and who are so fierce and powerful, that they fear neither man, or the beasts of the forest. After passing a small village, the only one we had seen during a ride of some hours, we emerged from the wooded glen, to an elevated table-land, overlooked by the lofty peaks of Mount Olenos, and commanding a view of the plain of Lalla, the ruin of which town we could see at a couple of miles' distance.

* At the baths of Pfeffers in Switzerland is a similar kind of bridge.

The Lalliot Turks, at the commencement of the Revolution, although famed for their courageous disposition and hardy habits, shared the fate of the other Mahomedan inhabitants of the Morea, and after a sharp skirmish with the insurgents, by whom they were defeated, retired with their families and effects to Patras, and contributed to defend the fortress, until it was surrendered to Marshal Maison. Lalla, therefore, is now merely occupied by a few Greeks, who cultivate the Turkish lands, as the tenants of government. From the open ground near Lalla we descended the mountains towards a romantic valley, through which the Dogana, or Erymanthus, flows, previous to uniting with the Alpheus, near Olympia. The road, if such it could be called, was the worst, without exception, that I had ever passed,—it was a mere sheep-track, and having never been cleared from either the shrubs or rocks which encumbered it, could only have been traversed by the little ponies on which we were mounted: they scrambled from rock to rock with the agility and sagacity of a goat;

and although my steed fell with me twice, I found that the safest plan was to leave the bridle hanging on his neck. Anastasius led the way, and the horse followed as closely as would a dog; stopping when he did, and turning right or left as his master's steps dictated. It was impossible to advance quicker than a walk, and my attendants on foot had therefore no difficulty in keeping up with me. Two deep ravines that we came to were crossed by bridges of either Venetian or Turkish construction; from which circumstance alone I judged that we were moving upon a regular road. To the Greeks, the difficulty of communication between one town and another is a source of exultation, as they very rightly deem, that a spot which is not easily accessible can be defended with but little difficulty; but however correct this reasoning might have been when applied to the time that their country was invaded by a merciless enemy, there is no reason why it should be suffered to operate for the future. A person unaccustomed to mountain scenery would have viewed the road we crossed this day with a pardonable degree of alarm, as one false step might have hurled him down a steep declivity of several hundred feet: but this does not appear of im-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

whence they could escape whenever they pleased. Anastasius, though an amusing cicerone, seemed however not to be quite free from the predatory habits he had acquired during the war. He had been expatiating with an unusual flow of eloquence upon the hardships the peasantry had experienced during that period, both from friend and foe ;—“ but now,” said he, “ we respect each other’s property.” Scarcely, however, had he uttered these words, when a lamb which had strayed from its flock approached the road-side ; in an instant Anastasius had seized it, and having cautiously looked around to see if he were observed, he drew his knife, and was about to plunge it into the animal’s throat, when I protested against this act of rapine. Anastasius had forgotten his newly acquired morality, and in answer to my remonstrances replied, “ that if we did not eat him, the wolves would.” I however held firm, and the little truant was released, and disappeared among the bushes. A few yards farther on we met the shepherd and his flock ; but although we acquainted him with his loss, and offered to purchase a sheep from him, he turned sulkily away, and would scarcely deign to answer us.

The shepherds in these districts of Arcadia are a wild, uncouth race, and as far removed from civilization as it is possible for man to be ; their lives, for ever passed amongst these secluded mountains, are devoted solely to the care of their flocks ; and when the pasturage is exhausted in one tract of country, they move onwards to another : their huts may be seen occasionally near an inclosure of brambles, in which the young lambs are left to the care of the faithful dogs, who sedulously guard them from danger, whilst the master is superintending the wanderings of his flock in another direction. The women are employed in spinning cotton for their own and husbands' garments, and in making the coarse millet-bread and small cheeses, which are their sole articles of food : but their wants do not extend beyond the mere necessaries of life. Though uncouth and brutal in his manners, the shepherd who calmly looks on whilst his enormous dog is tearing you to pieces, will gladly offer what hospitality his hut can afford to the weary traveller who seeks admittance, — for hospitality is a virtue which generally is to be found amongst people in a savage state ; but his churlish manner and uncivilized habits render him the fit representative, not of those Arcadians of whom the poets have sung, but of the rude tribe of Cynætheans who occupied this part of the country, and were famed for their contempt of the observances of civilization.

Towards sunset we descended from the high land, and came to a spot where two streams unite with the Erymanthus, whence the name of Tripotamia, by which it is known. Here formerly stood the ancient city of Psophis, the ruins of which I could perceive around me: the line of walls in one part were sufficiently perfect to show that they had been constructed with care, during the best period of military architecture; and the position of Psophis, at the entrance of three valleys, rendered it a post of military importance; it was also famed in the heroic ages as having been the scene of Hercules' conflict with the Boar of Erymanthus. Near a platform, which was probably the site of a temple, is a small Greek monastery, at this time only containing one monk, his brethren having been massacred by the Egyptians. A high wall encircled the building, which comprised a small church and a range of buildings for the Caloyers; several marble columns were lying on the ground in the yard; some fluted and others plain, but none were of a large size; and a Doric capital which was near them appeared to have been a work of the lower ages; the pillars that supported the entrance to the church were likewise antique, and above them, two heads in basso-relievo were fixed in the wall; but both the columns and the sculpture had been scraped and quite disfigured by the ignorant architects of the church. The attendant priest informed me that the columns had been found in digging near the monastery, which, as is almost universally the case, must have arisen upon the ruins of a Pagan temple. The fertile valley around Pşophis is capable of supporting a numerous population, as there is abundance of water for the purposes of irrigation; but this part of the country having been Turkish property, it is now in the hands of Government, and is cultivated by peasants, who, allured by the superiority of the soil, left the mountains and have taken it on lease, the rent being thirty per cent. of the produce. From hence the road turns off to Calavrita; but instead of proceeding thither, I crossed the Erymanthus, and rode to the eastward. Near the ruined khan of Tripotamia were some miserable huts, occupied by families who had settled there, and were now busily employed in collecting their harvest of Indian corn; they seemed to be in great misery, and the women and children were barely clad; but the fruitfulness of the valley they inhabit promises them future years of prosperity.

Shortly after dark, I agreed with my guides that it would be advisable to stop at the first habitation we should see: my horses were completely exhausted, and the Greeks who accompanied me, after a march of seventeen hours, did not feel capable of proceeding farther. A light which we perceived at a short distance from the road, and towards which some shepherds were driving their flocks, led us to hope that we should find a village there; but, after fighting our way through a host of barking dogs, we perceived that there was merely a bivouac constructed by peasants, who had descended from their mountain-village into the plains, for the purpose of gathering the harvest. We were instantly surrounded by the rustics, who, with eager curiosity, inquired what were our wishes. Food and lodging were wants easily understood, and which they hastened to gratify; the half of a hut was cleared out for my reception, and the trifling sum of one dollar enabled me to purchase a sheep, which was forthwith placed whole before a fire to roast. My lodging for the night, though not exactly what a person unacquainted with hardship would have deemed habitable, to me appeared a comfortable refuge from the cold blasts of wind which rushed down the chasms of the mountains. A large fire blazed in the middle of the hut; and the maize with which it was partly filled having been cleared away, sufficient room was obtained for me to spread my cloak on the ground, and, by lying down, defend myself from the smoke, which, rising to the roof, escaped through the openings of the leaves. The zone or girdle of my hostess, ornamented with silver bosses, hung against the walls, and the richly ornamented arms beside them indicated that my entertainers were not of the poorest class; all pretension to finery having been swept away by the events of the war. When the husband was superintending the roasting of the sheep, his wife and another pretty young woman came into the hut, and placed themselves opposite to me, and then taking the distaff and spindle in hand commenced working. Whilst they catechised my servant as to my quality, some handsome though dirty little urchins crept in, one by one, and slunk behind their mothers, staring at me all the while with undisguised amazement, and, when I spoke to them, roaring most loudly, and seeking refuge in the lap of their parents, from the strange looks of the Frank. By degrees they were pacified, and then, in return for Theodore's communications, mine hostess told her own tale of sorrow. Through her coarse attire and sun-burnt face I could trace the remains of great beauty ; her full black eye still sparkled with the fire of youth, although hardship had impressed upon her features the stamp of age ; and, whilst she recounted the narrative of her sufferings, I observed tears gushing down her cheek. There was no affectation in this—she spoke what she felt—and I therefore believed her, and will relate the substance of her narrative, not as peculiar to herself alone, but as one which might apply to almost every mother in the Morea.

Marriages are contracted early in Greece : although only twenty-five years of age, she had already been ten years a wife when I saw her, and until the year 1825 she had lived in the retired village of Dacouni, unmolested by the contending parties, and only knowing that war existed by the occasional absence of the male inhabitants, and their return with the spoils they had plundered from the Turks ; but at that period a fearful change took place in the position of the Moreots ;—Ibrahim Pacha landed at Navarin. With such a foe as this upon their threshold, it might have been supposed that the Greeks would have smothered their intestine feuds, and have made common cause against the enemy ; but his arrival seemed only to add fuel

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

quite fearless of an attack ; more than two hundred men from the canton having some days before proceeded down the valley of the Erymanthus, on the only road by which an enemy could approach. Thus, not above a score of armed Greeks were mixed with the women, and these had proceeded to the monastery, not with the view of protecting the females, but from mere feelings of devotion. So perfectly unsuspecting were the peasants of any danger, that they had left no scouts outside of the building to warn them if an enemy should approach, nor had they even closed the doors of the monastery, which, in addition to its own wealth, had been made the depository of the little possessed by the villagers ; they falsely supposed that their absent band of soldiers would ward off evil from them.

The sun was setting : with that superstitious devotion characteristic of the Greeks, the members of the congregation were humbling themselves before the altar, when, on a sudden, other sounds than the chants of the priests burst upon their ears : the clattering of horses' hoofs, the appalling shout of Allah, Allah, Allah ! resounded through the building, and in an instant the sanctuary was invaded by a host of Arabs. A dreadful scene ensued : the mingled calls upon Jesus and Mahommed were soon indistinctly heard—and the name of the Prophet was alone audible. The priests were inhumanly massacred at the altar where they had been officiating; and the few Greeks who desperately attempted to defend their shrieking wives and children were instantaneously butchered. The women, and boys under twelve years of age, were reserved for a fate still more dreadful—hopeless slavery!

My hostess chanced, at the first alarm, to be near a postern-gate; and availing herself of the opportunity, she rushed through it with many others: but when she had gone some distance, she found that her child was missing—he had become a slave to the Moslems! Her agony may be conceived: at one moment she thought of turning back, but in time recollected that she would only render herself a captive, without the least chance of being united to the boy; and she saw, that her only hope of saving him was by paying a heavy ransom.

The conflagration of Dacouni, which immediately followed the sack of the monastery, enabled her to rescue but little of her property from the hands of the Arabs; having however, by the sacrifice of all that she possessed, procured a thousand piastres, (about fifteen pounds,) she followed the bloody traces of his captors to Patras, where the Turks offered the child for sale, and the poor mother was enabled to redeem him. The boy, who was resting his head in his mother's lap, seemed little to feel the pain he had given her, and which even now called tears to her eyes; but the woman her companion was much affected, and said that she should never see two of her children again, for they were slaves at Alexandria.

These villagers were loud in their praises of the change in the government, to which they attributed the present quiet state of the country, whereas they ought rather to thank their own good dispositions. Previous to the year 1828, the whole country was ravaged by bands of armed men, who, although unable to cope with their national enemies, had power enough to oppress their country people: the roads were infested with robbers; the peasant, when following his plough, never for a moment laid aside his arms; and those persons who were obliged to travel across the country, were hourly exposed to the attacks of banditti.

But these evils had been so long and deeply felt, that the very actors in them sighed for the return of peace; and when the President, as a preliminary measure towards quieting the Morea, directed that no persons should appear armed, except those employed by the Government; he was instantly obeyed. The exhaustion which necessarily followed an exterminating war of seven years' duration, placed great moral power in the hands of Capo d'Istrias, and, without the employment of a single soldier, he, by a simple mandate, at once allayed the intense fermentation of the country; a chief was appointed from amongst the elders of each village, to collect the rents for the Government, and these were fixed at ten per cent. of the produce of private property, and thirty per cent. for the lands held upon lease from the Government. Since then, two successive years of peace have enabled them to collect their harvests, and at least place themselves beyond the chance of starvation, and they now look forward to an undisturbed possession of the lands for which they so long contested, and in many instances have dearly bought. The frankness of manner, and apparent cordiality, manifested towards me by these mountaineers, inspired me with such confidence, that I slept as soundly amidst them as if I had been surrounded by guards; and although my baggage might have offered some temptation to people who had been leading an unsettled life, yet I was convinced that the rights of hospitality would be observed.

Long before the day dawned next morning, I resumed my ride, and in five hours reached a small plain, through the midst of which meandered the clear and copious stream of the Landon, or Ladon, which flows into the Alpheus near its junction with the Erymanthus. It was on the banks of this river that Daphne was metamorphosed into a laurel, that she might escape from the pursuit of Apollo. The stream was shadowed by the trees which bent over it, but I could not see whether amongst them the laurel was conspicuous; the young maidens of an adjoining village had, however, but little pretension to the fatal beauty of the unfortunate nymph. Two hours beyond this we came to the plain of Dara, in the midst of which were the ruins of a large khan, which had been destroyed during the war. Several villages were visible on the slopes of the hills around, and the plain was covered with flocks of sheep, tended by rustics bearing the true pastoral crook in their hands: this then was a real Arcadian scene,—but how different from what the poets describe! Instead of being covered with shady forests and watered by murmuring rills, the mountains were bare, parched, and rocky; the plain, in lieu of a verdant turf enamelled with anemonies and daisies, barely afforded a scanty and withered herbage for the sheep which were browsing around ; and the shepherds, who ought to have been seated under some majestic tree, playing the flageolet to their coy and beautiful shepherdesses, were ugly, miserable wretches clad in sheepskins, and so bronzed by the sun and by dirt, as to resemble in complexion the tints of an Ethiop. Thus at every step a stranger makes in Greece, the veil of romance is forcibly rent from his eyes ; all that in childhood he read of as grand and imposing, gradually fades in his estimation ; the delightful fictions of the poets, after playing upon his imagination for years, are suddenly denuded of their charms, and exposed in all their deformity ; and the visions of goddesses, demi-gods, and heroes of former ages, becoming gradually less distinct, are at last, if not forgotten, divested of the romantic mystery which hung over them, and degraded by comparison with what exists in the present day.

On leaving Dara, we again crossed some hills, and then traversed the plain of Lebidé, having on our left the lake of Orchomenos. The scenery around was wild and barren : we had been imperceptibly ascending until we had reached the level of the plain of Tripolizza, some thousand feet above the level of the sea: there was snow on the mountains, and the glens we passed were destitute of verdure, and seemed as if they had been desolated by the mountain torrents, which had torn large masses of rock from their foundation, and hurled them into the bed of the ravines. So cheerless and gloomy was this part of the country, that I was not sorry when we approached Sangeh, a small village at the foot of the pass of Portes, by which we were next day to cross Mount Mallevo (Artemesius), the loftiest point of the range of mountains separating Arcadia from Argolis. Sangeh was one of the few villages which had not been burnt by Ibrahim's troops, and the house of the Pappas, or priest, was pointed out to me as the best, and where I should be sure of reception.

This sounded well; and although I did not expect to see a pretty whitewashed parsonage, ornamented with woodbine and jessamine, and presenting the image of comfort and cleanliness, yet I thought that the priest would have occupied a mansion somewhat more respectable than those which I had hitherto seen. Vain hopes! The parsonage contained neither chimney, bedstead, table or chair: in one corner of the one room was a vat full of wine, some large bins

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

disagreeable manner. When we at last attained the summit, we waited until the daylight would enable us with safety to descend the rocky road leading to the opposite valley, for the ridge on which we stood was only twenty feet wide, and terminated on one side by a perpendicular precipice of great depth, along the summit of which a narrow path three feet wide had been cut; the descent was not unaccompanied with danger to our horses; on one side rose a wall of rock, on the other there was no parapet, and the eye looked down upon valleys and chasms which through the medium of the morning mists appeared to be immeasurably distant. At the extremity of a long valley the rising sun disclosed to us the Acropolis of Argos, and, as it gradually appeared above the horizon, the silvery vapours which floated around insensibly melted away, and displayed beneath us a beautiful valley, whilst to the southward the view extended as far as Tripolizza.

Twenty men might have defended this pass against an unlimited number, yet in the hands of the Moreots it was useless, and they allowed Ibrahim to occupy it without opposition. From hence we proceeded down the valley along the banks of the Charadrus, and after passing several ruins which appeared to date from the early ages, we reached the confines of the celebrated plain of Argos, and shortly afterwards entered the straggling streets which wind amongst the ruins of that ancient city.

CHAPTER II.

Count J. Capo d'Istrias.—Parties in Greece.—Arrival of the the President.—His ambitious views and bad Government.—Counts Viario and John Capo d'Istrias.—Assembly at Argos.—Greek Oratory.—State of Finances.—Argos.—Hydra.—Spezzia.—Ipsara.—Scio.—Vourla.

ALMOST the first person whom I chanced to see when I arrived at Argos was Count John Capo d'Istrias, the president of Greece. He was calling upon a gentleman at whose house I stopped, and from his dress I at first mistook him for a Russian officer, and was much pleased with his exceedingly gentleman-like manner and winning address. His features are handsome and dignified, his figure erect and well-proportioned, and his prepossessing appearance is not unsupported by his conversational powers, which are those of a well-informed, well-bred man of the world. Such is the appearance of the man who now presides over the interests of Greece; and before I continue my personal narrative, it may be as well that I should cast a cursory view over the events of the last two years since he has held the reins of government.

The campaign of 1826 had terminated unfavourably for the Greek cause. Ibrahim Pasha, with his Egyptians, occupied or devastated at his will every part of the Morea, except Napoli di Romania and Epidauria: the citadel of Athens was closely invested by the Visir Kutayieh, and the dissensions which existed amongst the Greek chieftains raged with greater violence than ever. The common danger, instead of uniting, made them but cling with more tenacity to what little power they still retained; and distrustful as they were of each other's intentions, it was fruitless to expect even the semblance of union amongst them. During the first years of the revolution, three factions rent the country with their eternal disputes: each grasped at power, and in turn exercised it; each waged civil war against the others; and thus, when the invasions of an enemy should have been the signal for calling the Greeks to arms, those who ought first to have answered the summons were imbruing their hands in the blood of their countrymen.

The first of these parties was headed by the Primates, or great landed proprietors; a set of men who owed their influence to the situation which they held under the Pashas, for they acted as an intermediate body betwixt the Turkish authorities and the people; they were generally selected by the Pashas from amongst those Greeks possessed of most landed property in the districts, and to them they looked for the payment of the haratsch,* and other taxes imposed by the government. Under the plea of enforcing the orders of the Pasha, the Primates were guilty of the most arbitrary conduct; the unfortunate Rayah, who should have looked up to his countrymen for support, knew that even the Turk was merciful compared to him; and the intimate knowledge which the Primates possessed of the resources of every Greek who resided within their district, rendered all subterfuge on the plea of poverty unavailing. He who did not submit to be plundered illegally by his Primates was sure to be ruined on some legal pretext by the satellites of government. The Primates, though better educated, formed probably the most vitiated class in the Morea: domineered over by every petty Turk in the country, they soothed their pride by tyrannizing over their wretched tenants; and the acts of rapine, fraud, and oppression, by which their sway was distinguished, were more grievously felt and bitterly complained of than those emanating from the will of their imperious masters. The Turk governed Greece as a conquered country, from which he had a right to extract what wealth he could—he had no feelings in common with the Rayahs whom he ruled over; but the Primates knew well what pangs they inflicted, and those deeds which when committed by a Turk might be excusable as the force of habit, in a Primate could only be considered in the light of a crime. The next faction comprised those persons who, as captains of Armatoli, or leaders of bands of Klepths, had possessed themselves of the military power, and who, as long as affairs remained in an unsettled state, were sure of retaining influence; but these chieftains were all divided amongst themselves, and the Moreots and Roumeliots hated each other as cordially as they did the Turks. The third, or constitutional party, comprised all the most enlightened characters in Greece,—men who to natural talents united the advantages of an European education, and in some cases what is rarely to be met with in Greece—probity and disinterestedness.

* Capitation tax.

The Greek chieftains looked upon each other mutually as a set of “intriguants,” who were constantly trying to undermine and supplant each other; and self-interest being the latent motive for all their actions, they would swear an alliance with the opposition faction one day, and have no scruple in breaking it on the next, should there be an opening for them to join the ruling party. Each person acted as a spy upon the actions of the other, and he who professed to speak with the greatest frankness was sure to be masking some deep design. The perfect knowledge they possessed of their mutual characters placed them so completely on their guard, that even in the most trivial occurrences they withheld their confidence, unless their mutual interest tended to the same point,—then the greatest enemies hesitated not to coalesce, and apparently act in concert, each flattering himself that the other was a dupe of whom he made use, with the firm intention of casting him aside whenever it suited his convenience; and thus the cleverest man, or most accomplished hypocrite, was sure to gain the upperhand. Those who found themselves thrown

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the delegates of the people were convened at Trœzen, where, amidst the relics of departed grandeur, they debated upon the means to be pursued for the salvation of their ruined country. To all it became evident that unanimity must be the basis of their actions, and to obtain this, General Sir Richard Church was nominated commander-in-chief of the army, and Lord Cochrane placed at the head of the maritime force of the country. At the same time, Count J. Capo d'Istrias was invited to Greece, and, as President, requested to assume the government of the country.

Count J. Capo d'Istrias is a Corfiot by birth; and his family, which is of ancient descent, is possessed of considerable property in that island. Count John, who is the second brother, brought himself to the notice of the Russians at the time when they held possession of the Ionian Islands; and having since entered their service, he became well known to the world as a diplomatist, and received credit for a considerable share of talent. At the congress of Vienna he is reported to have called forth from Prince Metternich the remark, "Ce jeune homme là nous a fait la barbe à tous," whilst another eminent statesman, Sir T. Maitland, in expressing his opinion of Capo d'Istrias's abilities, said that he was a mere “ political puppet.” Which of the two sentiments was correct, his conduct since his elevation to the Presidency of Greece will best determine. In the year 1819, a visit which he made to Corfu was supposed to have been in connexion with the views of the Hetairists, whose cause he was known to advocate; but when the revolution burst forth in Wallachia, and that Greece was called upon to arm by Prince Alexander Ipsilanti, Capo d’Istrias was urgent in his endeavours to check the progress of an insurrection which, being premature, he foresaw threatened destruction to those concerned in it; he is said to have strongly assured the Greeks that they had no assistance to hope from Russia; and however he may secretly have been connected with their party, he overtly disavowed their proceedings; and, until he was summoned by the nation, did not offer to join the patriot cause; – but there can be no doubt that he had from the commencement looked forward to the supreme command.

In the month of January 1828, Capo d’Istrias arrived at Napoli di Romania in a British line of battle ship; and Griva, who was at that time at war with Colocotroni, opened the gates of the fortress to him, and thus placed the key of the Morea in his hands; the other refractory chieftains hastened to show their patriotism by acknowledging the President, who, without any exercise of force, found himself at the head of the nation. At this period the fears of the Greeks, as to their political existence, were hushed; the decided part taken by the allied powers, the battle of Navarino, and the results to which it led, had paralysed the movements of their most formidable opponent Ibrahim Pasha; and although it is true that the fatal battle of Athens had been followed by the surrender of the Acropolis, the last stronghold possessed by the Greeks in Eastern Hellas, the Turkish army had not been able to penetrate through the defiles of the Geraunian mountains, or force the position taken up by Church for the defence of the Isthmus of Corinth. From the enemies of Greece the President had therefore comparatively little to fear, and his whole attention ought to have been occupied in allaying the irritation caused by the factions I have before alluded to, and in restoring quiet to the unhappy peasantry. To further his views, all parties were willing to concur. Those men who had hitherto been foremost in opposing the established government, when the member of a native cabal was at its head, hesitated not to support a person who, it was hoped, would prove a stranger to the intrigues of party and to the spirit of faction. The reputation for talent he had acquired when forming one of the Russian cabinet, fostered the opinion that he was so well initiated in the secret of legislation, as to become a rigid protector of the interests of the infant nation. His arriving in a British man-of-war, at a time when the Allies had announced their intention of interfering in favour of Greece, seemed to imply that he came as the dictator chosen by the allied powers; and all classes, anxious to manifest their gratitude for the protection of the allies, hastened to promise submission to the President. Greece lay prostrate at his feet. How he availed himself of this disposition towards him, will hereafter appear.

The first step taken by Capo d'Istrias was to issue a proclamation, dated from on board of the Revenge, calling upon the Greeks to acknowledge his authority, and directing them to lay aside their arms. The alacrity with which this edict was submitted to, is highly creditable to the Greek peasantry; and the result of the measure was the internal pacification of the country: those people who had hitherto derived the means of existing from rapine and extortion, were obliged to seek a more peaceable mode of subsistence; the industrious classes were enabled to till their land and reap its fruits; the highways were no longer infested by a lawless banditti; and peace and security were restored to the interior of families. This great point being gained, it was now hoped that the President, when selecting his subordinate ministers, would have made the choice without any reference to their party feelings, and have merely allowed talent and integrity to be claims upon his notice; but the result did not justify this impression. Having abolished the preceding form of government, he proceeded to nominate a council, called the Panhellenium; but though nominally possessing some power, this assembly was virtually merely used by him as a convenient mask to the really despotic authority that he reserved in his own hands. The contributions of France and Russia replenished his treasury, and gave him a force more irresistible in Greece than the employment of a powerful army; and armed with these weapons, he no sooner saw himself in possession of the supreme power, than he began to prosecute his insidious designs, tending to the aggrandizement of himself and his family; to effect which, he hastened to form a party, upon whose subserviency he could with certainty depend. To maintain himself in his post, as chief of the Greeks, was no doubt the object of his ambition; and whilst he tried to cajole England and France by an appearance of liberality and candour, he really rested his hopes upon Russia, who having at all times looked upon Greece as a country she coveted, would no doubt prefer to see her governed by a man Russian in heart and education, and in whose hands she would be nothing more or less than a Russian province, than to find her influenced by the liberal policy of France and England.

Having fixed upon his plan of operations, the President's first care was to disgust, or otherwise get rid of, all those men whose integrity of principle and patriotism were bars to his personal views, and to replace them by members of his family, and Ionians, upon whom he could place implicit reliance. Prince Mavrocòrdato, Tricoupi, and many other persons of merit, were forced to retire from office; and the President's two brothers, Counts Viario and Augustin, were summoned from Corfu, where they had hitherto passed their days in obscurity, and called upon to assist in presiding over the destinies of Greece. Viario, the eldest, was forthwith placed at the head of the war and marine departments; and no sooner did he assume the office than his incapacity and ignorance became manifest: from that day the President's popularity began to decline; and so well has Viario followed up the system he commenced, that he is now utterly detested, and not only receives credit for his own misdeeds, but is also supposed to instigate his brother, Count John, to perform those acts which have called down upon him the hatred of men who once were his firmest friends and supporters. Count Augustin is a very young man; he had been educated for the law, but made no progress in his profession, and was idling at Corfu when his brother was nominated to the Presidency of Greece. In him, Capo d'Istrias discovered some latent sparks of military talent, (acquired no doubt by watching the drill of our regiments on the esplanade,) and the experience thus learnt sufficed to point him out as the leader of the Greek army in Acarnania. Measures were therefore taken to thwart and disgust Sir Richard Church, who, as Generalissimo of the Greeks, had been successfully employing himself with his nominal army in clearing Western Greece from the Turks; and by refusing him supplies

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

and Russian subsidies with a liberal hand, on the plea of indemnity for losses sustained during the war, and the celebrated Colocotroni, who possesses great influence amongst the peasantry of the Morea, by this means was firmly bound to the President's party; the ignorant Moreots were led to believe that Ibrahim had been expelled from the country by Capo d'Istrias, and that they owed their present security entirely to him; and as he abstained from taxation, they were easily induced to acquiesce in any measure proposed by the President's satellites. Thus the country was ruled with a tyranny not the less severely felt, though masked under the garb of liberty; the bright dreams of the well-wishers to Greece were dispelled by the conduct of him to whom they had looked as a preserver; factions which they supposed were quelled, like the heads of the Hydra, sprung up more formidable than ever; the demoralization of Greece advanced with rapid strides, and as a final blow to the happiness of the country, a system of espionage was established, unequalled perhaps in the most despotic country in the world. The child was set as a spy upon the actions of the parent, the brother upon the brother; the privacy of families was invaded, letters were opened, and on one occasation the government mail was actually robbed by the orders of the President, who was anxious to examine its contents.*

Such were the leading characteristics of the President's rule during 1828, and part of the following year; but the Protocol to the Treaty of London having then become public, and struck a death-blow to his ambitious hopes, he resolved, by a great political stroke, to impress the Allies with the idea, that in removing him from the government of Greece, they would act in direct opposition to the wishes of that nation, which, as he would prove to the world, he had so ably governed. For this purpose he resolved to convene a National Assembly; and his emissaries were immediately directed to secure the election of such men as had no opinions of their own, or would presume to differ from the directions they would receive for their future guidance. Circular letters of the Pre-

* A gentleman, whose name I have forgotten, in a letter to a friend, written shortly after the publication of the Protocol, made some judicious remarks on the subject, but without in the least reflecting on the government of the President. The letter was intercepted, and was made the ground of an accusation against him. He was found guilty by the subservient judges, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment!

sident's own composition were sent to the electors and deputies, wherein he warned them that they were to assent to all his measures, "et en rien changer la position actuelle du President," under pain of being ejected from their employments; and as he was afraid that, even with these precautions, he should not be able to obtain the overwhelming majority he wished for, he nominated deputies from Candia and other islands belonging to the Turks, as well as from the armies of the Morea, and Eastern and Western Greece! Satisfied with these precautions, and with the knowledge that the ignorant clowns deputed from the Morea were mere machines he could move at will, he summonsed the States of Greece to assemble at Argos, and the ancient theatre, at the foot of the Larissa hill, was cleared out for their reception. A better spot than this could not have been selected, observed the editor of the Smyrna Gazette, "pour jouer la comedie."

The proceedings of this assembly were such as might have been foreseen. The resolutions they entered into were all prepared by the President, who, in receiving their thanks and communications, merely heard repeated what he had himself composed. He opened the sitting dressed in a Russian uniform, and wearing

Russian orders, and uttered a speech explanatory of the leading points of his government, and of the manner in which the finances of the state had been disbursed; adding, that to them he had devoted "les derniers restes" of his fortune. Every measure he proposed was carried by acclamation. An income of 30,000 S. dollars was offered to him, which he, with great apparent disinterestedness, refused;* and he was requested to continue the line of conduct that he had hitherto pursued with so much advantage to the nation.

In an assembly thus constituted, there was of course but little oratorical display; and those who did venture to adorn their language with a few classical quotations, were listened to with astonishment by their less accomplished comrades. Their ignorance gave rise to an amusing scene. There is a very common expression amongst Eastern nations, implying, "May you eat dirt!" which in Greek is signified by the words, "Na to fas." It chanced during the sittings of the assembly, that one of the deputies, who was better informed than the rest, wishing to make a display of his erudition, introduced in his speech the Latin quotation, "Fas, aut nefas," and when he uttered it, accidentally fixed his eyes on one of the Moreot deputies seated opposite to his. The other thinking that the speech was addressed to him, and hearing a word resembling the expression above alluded to, instantly sprang from his seat, and shaking his fist at the astonished orator, roared out, "Na to fas! na to fas yourself."

* Count John Capo d'Istrias cannot be taxed with ever having tried to increase his private fortune at the expense of the Greeks; in money matters he is perfectly disinterested, although his brothers are less scrupulous. The 30,000 dollars were offered to him at his own instigation, that he might have the merit of refusing them.

A slight change was made by the President in the form of government; he found that the Panhellium was not always inclined to submit to his dictation, and he seized this opportunity of forming a new council, to be styled the Senate. It was composed of twenty-seven members, twenty-one of whom were to be chosen by the President from a list of sixty presented by the Congress, whilst the remainder were entirely at his nomination; and whatever vacancy might occur was likewise to be filled up by him. But this council, though so completely at the disposal of the President, was allowed only the semblance of authority; it merely had to approve or negative the "projets de lois" submitted to it by him, and which in either case could be carried into effect on his own responsibility. In financial arrangements alone was its consent required.

The Assembly likewise gave its sanction to a new coinage, bearing the emblem of a Phoenix on one side, and the name of the President on the other; and also to the institution of an order, to be called St. Saviour, with the insignia of which all those who contributed to the liberation of Greece were to be decorated; but although the first mentioned resolution has been carried into effect, the latter has not been acted upon. A law was also passed authorizing the Government to take possession of the church lands.

The revenue for the past year, as laid before the National Assembly, did not appear to be in a very flourishing state; the taxes only producing 8,539,969 piastres, (or 116,711*l.*) which with the French and Russian subsidies, and some other funds, formed a total of 350,940*l.*, to which the expenditure nearly amounted, only 30,000*l.* being left in hand for the expenses of the current year. The following is the statement published in the Government Gazette.*

* The Government Gazette is published in the French language, at Ægina.

Receipts from January 1828, to April 1829.

	Piastres.
Revenue	8,539,969
Funds of the National Bank	2,034,660
Prizes not liquidated	233,414
*Owing to several by the State	455,845
Funds given by his Excellency the Pre- sident	} 1,706,576
French Subsidies	8,265,000
Russian ditto	4,383,200
Total	25,618,664

Expenditure.

Land and sea service	13,647,214
Sundry establishments	684,335
Civil List	1,879,864
Orphanotrophe	38,779
Charitable Donations	356,880
Paid to Creditors of the State	281,771
Unpaid by the farmers of the Public Revenue	658,948
Paid to Lord Cochrane	159,510
Value of cargoes paid to Admiral Dandolo	115,831
Cash in hand	2,129,022
Total piastres	25,618,664

15 piastres are equal to one Spanish dollar—73 piastres 1*l.* sterling.

The obedient representatives of Greece had now performed all that their Chief required from them; they had enabled the President to

* The original expression is “ Du à divers par l'Etat.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

characterise the sovereign of a free nation. His views of government are contracted; and it will be a happy day for Greece when he is called upon to lay down the power which he has so much abused. The assembly being dissolved, Capo d'Istrias transferred the seat of government from Ægina to Napoli; and thus were affairs situated when I entered Greece.

The various accounts I had heard of the beauty and richness of the plains of Argos, caused me much disappointment. A perfectly level plain, of about forty square miles, undiversified by trees or hedges, and hemmed in by a barren and rugged range of mountains, was not calculated to excite much admiration; and the very few hamlets which are scattered over it being composed of mere mud huts, did not appear as striking objects; but when I passed the hill of the Acropolis, and that I beheld before me the town of Argos, and in the distance Napoli di Romania, with its impregnable Palamede, the spacious gulf bounded by the bold mountains of Laconia and Epidamia, the marsh of Lerna, and the site of Mycenæ, my classical recollections induced me to view the scene with much interest. Argos appeared to be a large straggling village, interspersed with ruins of Turkish Pyrgi, Christian churches, Turkish mosques, and masses of Roman brickwork; but however uninviting the first coup d'œil may have been, it was not in the least improved upon a closer examination. Alternately devoted to the flames by Greeks and Turks, Argos was now literally rising from its ashes; but, unlike the phœnix, not with renovated beauty,—three houses, belonging to the President, Mr. Dawkins, and Colonel Gordon, being the only mansions that were habitable; the rest were mud hovels. It contains 5000 inhabitants, most of whom are cultivators of the surrounding plain.

I stayed so short a time at Argos that I was under the necessity of deferring my visits to its antiquities until my return, and I therefore proceeded four miles onwards to the Gulf of Napoli, where I embarked on board H. M. S. Favourite, Captain Harrison, for Vourla, where the British squadron was anchored.

In sailing out of the gulf, there was nothing to attract attention until we came opposite to the small islands of Spezzia and Hydra, which have become so celebrated by the part the inhabitants took in the naval struggle between Turkey and her revolted provinces. Previous to the Revolution, these islanders were the most favoured subjects of the Porte; no Turks ever resided on their islands, the tribute they paid was merely nominal, and in return for these indulgences, the Sultan hoped to obtain a supply of experienced sailors to man his fleet. Both parties were satisfied with this arrangement; the Hydriots and Spezziots devoted their attention solely to commerce, every male inhabitant became a sailor, and these barren rocks, at the commencement of the war, monopolized all the carrying trade of the Levant. Their wealth became proportionately great; and of all the subjects of the Porte, whether Christian or Moslem, they had least felt its despotic system of government, and were, in fact, quite independent. But when the wrongs of their less favoured countrymen called aloud for redress, the restless and enterprising spirit of the Hydriots induced them to join the patriot cause, and foreseeing that, should they remain neuter, the Turks would nevertheless punish them for the sins of their fellow-rayahs, they felt convinced that not only patriotism but policy were in favour of their hoisting the flag of independence. The fame of their exploits under the gallant Miaulis and Tombazi resounded through Europe. With their little brigs, they feared not to encounter the numerous squadrons of the Ottomans, and many a line-of-battle-ship destroyed, many a fleet consumed by the flames, established their character for courage and skill, and struck terror into the hearts of their enemies. But these advantages were not gained without severe sacrifices on their parts. As their prosperity was solely owing to commerce, so when trade became stagnated, the sources of their wealth dried up, and their rocky islands being perfectly barren, they were obliged to expend their hoarded wealth in purchasing supplies for their numerous population. It is true that both Hydriots and Spezziots were paid by the Government for their services; but the emoluments they received were a poor remuneration for the wealth they acquired when their vessels were employed in trade. During the campaign, which lasted six months, a first-rate sailor received from seventy-five to one hundred piastres monthly, with which he had to support his family during the year; and when by a lucky capture an islander chanced to obtain an unexpected supply of money, like the gambler, who rolling in riches one day, is a beggar the next, so did the Hydriot think only of the present moment—the money he received was squandered in senseless profusion; and when all was expended, he felt a disgust for the plain habits of life to which he had been hitherto accustomed. Every Hydriot sailor had a share of the vessel in which he served ; and not unfrequently the loss of a ship entailed ruin upon several families :—thus when the war terminated, the Hydriots discovered that their sacrifices and devotions, instead of benefiting their interests, had only reduced them to the brink of poverty ; and that their political situation was infinitely worse than when they were under the Turkish government, for that now they had no privileges apart from the mass of the nation, and were obliged, in common with the continental Greeks, to contribute their share to the exigencies of the state. Disgusted with this result, and despairing of obtaining employment under their own flag, more than eight hundred Hydriots have, I understand, left Greece with the intention of entering the service of Mabomed Ali ; and whilst their own vessels are rotting in the harbour of Poros from a want of sailors to man, and cargoes to freight them, the navy of the Egyptian Pacha will receive an invaluable accession of strength from the men whose country he has laid waste and desolated.

The Spezziots, during the war, always acted with great circumspection, and have been

gainers, instead of losers, by the contest; for when they found that commerce was at a stand, they made war upon the world one day, as pirates, and, as patriots, fought the Turks the next, and by uniting these two capacities, have managed to obtain the character of good citizens, and to render themselves masters of great riches. They likewise are discontented, and wish for the return of former days; but their fate is sealed, and they must for the future compete with others in conducting the trade of Greece, and forget that they ever monopolized it.

We passed close under the rocky hills of Hydra: they were destitute of vegetation, and unadorned by a single tree; but several white houses were perched on the summits of the crags, where they served as look-out posts to warn the inhabitants of the town, should danger be approaching. It seemed a melancholy, dreary spot. From hence, a fair breeze carried us rapidly onwards: we passed the Bocca Silota during the night, and next morning ran close under Ipsara, which, like Spezzia and Hydra, contributed largely to the maritime successes of the Greeks, but unfortunately escaped not unscathed from the conflict. The Ipsariots were among the first who declared themselves independent, and with their fleet joined the Hydriot squadron; the most daring feats of the naval campaigns were executed by their sailors; and the intrepid Canaris was a native of Ipsara. The proximity of the island to the Asiatic coast exposed it, considerably more than Hydra or Spezzia, to the attacks of the Turks; and the injury the Ottoman fleet constantly experienced from the Ipsariot sailors, called aloud for vengeance; but during three years the Ipsariots were unmolested by the Turks; and it was only in 1824 that the Capitan Pasha, at the head of a numerous fleet, attacked the devoted island. The inhabitants were overpowered by numbers; many, in making a useless defence, perished sword in hand, and others were slaughtered whilst attempting to escape; but the greater part of the Ipsariots succeeded in reaching their ships with their families, and sought for shelter in Greece. Many of them are now at Napoli, Ægina, Poros, and other maritime towns of Greece; some few have returned to their desolate island. The town was sacked and burnt by the Capitan Pasha; but, when viewed from a distance, with the sun shining on the white walls of the houses, seemed still perfect and habitable: however, on approaching it, we perceived that the houses were roofless and

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

blue sky unchequered by a cloud; and the Ægean barely agitated by a gentle breeze. I beheld barren rocks, against which the foaming waves dashed with fury, scattering their spray high in the air; the soil, apparently unproductive and parched, barely affording nourishment to a few solitary, unhappy-looking trees bending beneath the fury of the blast; the towns, which deceived the eye from afar, proving to be in ruins, and the heavens darkened by the tempest. So did the Isles of Greece display themselves to me; but Scio was a favourable exception. It used in happier days to be called the Garden of the Archipelago: the hills were clad with forests of oak, and the valleys were bright with cultivation; the women were the most lovely of the East, the men, the best educated and most refined; and the inhabitants were renowned for their wealth and prosperity: but, in 1822, fifty-five thousand of the Sciotes either fell before the scimitar of the Turks, or were condemned to slavery. It is unnecessary to repeat the sad tale, which was heard and listened to with commiseration in every part of Europe. Suffice it to say, that Scio has not, nor ever will recover from the blow. A few inhabitants still occupy the island; but all that rendered Scio valuable has been swept away, and this ill-fated spot is comparatively a desert. The wind rushed through the chasms of the mountains with unparalleled violence when we sailed under their lea; and as the scud flew rapidly along, and for an instant obscured the face of the sun, the various tints of light and shade thrown upon the island had a most beautiful effect, and displayed to great advantage the romantic glens of the wooded mountains. The next day we beat up the Gulf of Smyrna, and anchored at Vourla in the midst of the British squadron.

From thence, on the 31st of October, I proceeded to Constantinople. So many books have been published relative to that city, that I am not presumptuous enough to undertake a new version of an oft-told tale. I will only say, that I had the honour of playing at Ecarté with the Capitan Pasha; that I saw the members of the Sultan's cabinet drinking the health of the King, and of Charles the Tenth, in bumpers of champagne, at the supper-table of Count Guillemot, on which a large ham was placed; that I was present when Avney Bey, Lieutenant-Colonel of the cavalry of the guard, and first Aid-de-Camp to the Sultan, requested a lady to waltz with him, and continued dancing during the whole evening ; that the Turkish ladies have lowered so much of their veil, that the infidels are now permitted to see part of the forehead, and even the nose ; and that Sultan Mahmoud wears boots, spurs, trowsers, and gloves, just like a Christian !

* * * * *

CHAPTER III.

The Cyclades.—Cape Colonna.—Temple of Minerva.—
 Ægina.—Tombs.—Palicari.—Orphanotrope.—Museum.—
 Temple of Jupiter.—Panhellenium.—Temple of Venus.—
 Quarantine.—Prince Demetrius Ypsilanti.—Ipsariot boatmen.—Poros.—Russian squadron.—Greek fleet.—Commerce.—Damala.—Trœzen.

ON the 24th December, His Majesty's cutter Hind, in which I returned from Constantinople, sailed between Andros and Negropont, through the Bocca Silota, on her way to Ægina. The island of Andros is not remarkable for its beauty, and the opposite coast of Negropont is likewise sterile and desolate; the mountains we passed were partly concealed by dense vapours floating round their summits; and the chasms into which they have been rent by some convulsion of nature, are quite destitute of herbage. In the distance, as we emerged from the narrow passage, we saw the grey land of Syra, Mycone, Tino, and Zea, better known under its ancient name of Cos, and as being the birthplace of Hippocrates, Apelles, and Simonides; and to the north-west we sought to catch a glimpse of Marathon, but were too far distant.

The day had already nearly closed before we passed Cos; and we eagerly looked towards the west, in the hopes that we might see “Sunium’s marbled steep” before dark. The setting sun had brightened the western horizon with a ruby tint; and when we doubled the south point of Long Island, we saw Cape Colonna stretching to the sea, and the seven columns which are left of its beautiful Temple strongly pencilled in the glowing sky, whilst all the land around was dark. For a few moments, the illuminated horizon continued to throw the Cape into strong relief; but, when the sky lost its borrowed light, the scene gradually became less distinct, and soon was concealed in darkness. I was unable, from personal examination, to ascertain what mutilations had been inflicted on the Temple of late years by various antiquarian amateurs; but I understand that the damage is irreparable, and leading to no useful result; for public museums have not benefited by its spoliation, and the fragments taken from the ruin are now lost to the world in the insignificant museums of some private persons. One of our own countrymen first set the example, by carrying off a few of the marbles, and he was successfully imitated by the captain of an Austrian frigate, who also caused the name of his ship to be painted in large red letters on the frieze of the Temple.* Whilst people were lamenting that time should have made such rapid ravages in this work of art, the beautiful columns were quietly borne away to other lands, and no one knew how they had disappeared; but the rage for antiquarian destruction has now ceased, and we may hope that the few remnants of Minerva's fame, which still act as a landmark to the sailor, and as a national memento to the Greeks, may for the future be left unmolested to war solely with the elements, whose influence they have withstood during so many centuries.

* A friend of mine who passed through Venice two years since, when visiting the Austrian buildings, observed some columns lying on the ground, which he recognised immediately as being of Grecian architecture. In answer to his remarks, the officer to whom he addressed himself, assented, and said that he had brought them from Cape Colonna; an English officer having first set the example. Thus it is, that the civilized moderns are inflicting greater injury upon the antiquities of Greece, than they received during many centuries exposure to the ravages of barbarians.

The weather had been so gloomy this day, that I tried in vain to recognise in the scenes before me those “blessed isles,” which, when seen from “Colonna’s height,” are said to be so beautiful; and I felt convinced, that a person who visits Greece with the hope of not finding his juvenile enthusiasm damped, and who would wish to retain a romantic impression of the classic soil, should never travel in winter. Our spirits are affected by the weather, as is a barometer. A brilliant sunshine not only gilds the scene before us, but likewise casts its exhilarating influence over our minds,—we view every thing under the most favourable colours; the lights and shadows cast upon the mountains create a thousand imaginary beauties, which, if divested of their splendour, would be dismal and chilling—decked with the rosy tints of a setting sun, the most terrific, sterile rocks are not deficient in beauty; we allow full play to our imagination, and the first impression remaining engraved in our memory, we always recur to that scene as representative of the distant spot. But if, instead of a bright summer’s day, a person views the shores of Greece in bleak December, the sea foaming around, a dense mass of clouds above, and the cheerless land appearing in all its nakedness, his feelings will be

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

building lately erected for a public school, it contains scarcely a single habitable mansion. In the main street are several shops, and the port, which was full of small trading vessels, is adorned with a well-built quay : there is likewise a quarantine establishment, and a church. The inhabitants, who are mostly refugees from Attica, Ipsara, and other places in the power of the Turks, are about five thousand in number ; at one time the island was crowded to excess with fugitives from the continent ; but these are gradually returning to their native villages ; and when Attica is evacuated by the Turks, Ægina will sink into comparative insignificance. The dwellings of these unfortunate people are most wretched ; and many of the unhappy Athenians and Ipsariots, unable even to procure a miserable hut, are content to dwell underground, in the ancient tombs of the Æginetæ, or of the fugitive Athenians. The rocks around the town are full of these sepulchral chambers, which have been opened in search of antique vases. They are entered by steps ; and the roof and sides, being covered with cement, protect those who inhabit them from the weather. A strange coincidence this, that the tombs of the Athenian dead, who were here buried at the time when they fled from their Persian invaders, should, twenty-two centuries afterwards, receive and shelter their descendants, like them, fugitives, and escaping from the despotism of an Eastern lord. The numerous vases, of exquisite design and workmanship, daily found in the tombs, induce us to think that they were most probably the work of the Athenians during their stay here; for, although Ægina was once of considerable importance previous to its conquest by Pericles, it seems improbable that the population of so small an island should have been either sufficiently numerous or wealthy to excavate such numberless tombs, or place in them so many beautiful vases. At all times, Ægina has afforded a refuge in the hour of danger to the Athenians. Once, during the Persian war; a second time, when Attica was ravaged by the Goths; and more than once since the commencement of the Revolution.

I had some difficulty in procuring lodgings. I was refused admittance at a place called the Hotel des Trois Puissances, because, it being Christmas Day, the landlord was absent feasting with his friends; but, after rambling through the town, I obtained a comfortable apartment in the house of an Athenian lady. She had fled from Athens at the commencement of the war, and, sacrificing an excellent house and its furniture, was happy to escape with her husband and two pretty daughters, with what portable property they possessed, to Hydra. She there hired a boat to convey them to Ægina; and having embarked all their valuables, awaited in a friend's house until a change of wind would enable them to sail. But the boatmen had other intentions; a boat full of baggage was a prize not to be often met with, especially without a little fighting; they therefore thought that it would be exceedingly wrong to miss such an opportunity of carrying off some booty; and when it was dark, they set all sail, and stood out to sea. Several hours after their departure, my landlady and her daughters proceeded to the beach with the intention of embarking; but when they reached the spot where the boat had been moored, none was to be seen; and she learnt, when it was too late, that there were as many miscreants among her countrymen as in the ranks of the enemy. She was now penniless, her husband died broken-hearted, and her young daughters had no guardian but her; so she struggled with her misfortunes, and managed, with the assistance of her relations, to live respectably, and educate her children, who were learning French and Italian. Her case is a common one; almost all the Athenians have been reduced from wealth to penury, and are utterly ruined.

On Sunday I had an opportunity of viewing the inhabitants in their best attire, and many varieties of costume were to be seen; but the gaudy finery of some of the dresses suited ill with the filth and wretchedness around. There were women of Ipsara with Turkish veils, concealing part of their faces; Hydriots, with dresses like those of the Swiss peasantry, Albanians, Moreots, and Athenians, who might be recognised by their braided hair. Some of the latter had beautiful faces, brilliant black eyes, arched eyebrows, and delicate red and white complexions; but almost all were painted. Their figures I cannot praise; for they are never seen; their clumsy gowns, with waists as high as the shoulders, destroy the symmetry of their form, and so disfigure them, that when their backs are turned, it is impossible to distinguish sixty from sixteen. The difference of dress amongst the men is not so striking, there being only two costumes—the island and the Albanian: the former is very unbecoming; the loose Turkish trowsers being substituted for the handsome white fustanella (phillibeg).

Ægina, at this moment, contained some of the leading characters in Greece. The President had arrived for the purpose of communicating with M. de Ribeaupierre, (who was on his way to Constantinople,) and persuading him that the welfare of Greece depended upon his being retained at the head of the government. He therefore directed a deputation from the Senate (apparently unconnected with himself) to wait upon the Ambassador, and, in the name of the Greek nation, request that his Majesty the Emperor of Russia would interfere to obtain the nomination of Capo d'Istrias as chief of Greece; that he would be pleased to grant them a pecuniary supply; and, moreover, use his influence with the Sultan to remove the restrictions upon Greek commerce in the Black Sea. To these solicitations M. de Ribeaupierre could return no direct answer: and late events have proved that the Emperor of Russia paid but little attention to the first of their demands. Whilst, however, the President strains every nerve to obtain his nomination to the sovereignty of Greece, he affects publicly an ardent desire to return into private life, and says that he will be most happy to serve as prime minister to the sovereign nominated by the allies, if the employment of his talents can in any way be of use to the nation. These expressions have been repeated by the German papers; and those persons whose only means of information are derived from the public press, are led to believe that he is a disinterested patriot; but a glance behind the scenes would speedily undeceive them, and show the crafty politician in his true colours.

Prince Ypsilanti was expected at Ægina, and Prince Mavrocordato, Sir Richard Church, Tri-coupi, and the heads of the opposition, usually resided here, taking no interest in public affairs, and waiting quietly until the fiat of the allied powers should be made public.

The movements of Capo d'Istrias were watched with much interest, as he had just returned from Salamis, whither he had proceeded in the steam-boat, in the hopes of allaying the clamours of the irregular troops, who thought proper to demand nine months' pay that was due to them. The force stationed at Salamis amounted to five thousand Roumeliots, under the command of their Capitani, amongst whom were Grisiotti, Vasso, Hadgi Christo, Metaxa, and others, whose names were celebrated during the war. As an army they were perfectly useless, they had no enemy to oppose, and it is impossible to divine what object was to be gained by keeping them imbodied. During several months they had been stationed in and around Salamis, doing literally nothing ; and as there was not a superabundance of money in the hands of Government, many considered that it would be advisable to disband them. The President was of a different opinion ; they were kept in arrears ; and then, on finding that their pay was not forthcoming, they threatened to march into the Morea, and remunerate themselves by the plunder of the country. This storm, which Capo d'Istrias had himself raised, he found it no easy matter to dispel. Having assembled the leaders of the Palicari, he attempted at first to amuse them with promises ; but finding that this was unavailing, he addressed one of the captains in terms of abuse, and threatened, should he not submit, to send him to his native forests to feed pigs, as he had used to do. The other, looking him full in the face, exclaimed, " Excellency ! He who dares send me to feed pigs is a man of dirt."—This conversation only increased the discontent, and the President found himself under the necessity of granting half their demand ; but as the Palicari would listen to no compromise relative to the remainder, fears were entertained lest they should put their threats into execution ; and it is more than probable that, if the French troops at Navarin had not at this time received a tele-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

most rapid progress. The school is on the Lancastrian system,—and Greece has to thank the benevolent feelings of the Dowager Empress of Russia for its establishment; she contributed the funds necessary for its construction, amounting, it is said, to 1,706,576 piastres, (or 23,377*l.*) from her private purse; it is, however, quite impossible, that the paltry building at Ægina could have cost such an enormous sum. A room in the Orphanotrope is allotted to the ancient marbles which have lately been discovered, and are intended as the commencement of a National Museum. There are several votive tablets, some basso relievos of no great merit, a mutilated colossal statue of Juno or Ceres, and an unfinished but remarkably spirited statue of a Harpy seizing a vase. This piece of sculpture is cut out of a block of dark-coloured marble three feet high, and although it is unpolished, and that the knobs from which the sculptor measured his proportions protrude here and there, it must be considered a very clever performance, and from its singularity invaluable,—for, if I mistake not, it is the only representation extant of those obscene birds. Several Greeks came into the room, and seeing me making a sketch of this figure, crowded round me. “What is it,” said one,—“is it a woman?”—

“No ! it is a man,” replied a second. — “It must be the devil,” said a third.

Milordo was appealed to; but my explanation, that it was the figure of a Greek lady, who once upon a time lived in an island near Zante, and was very fond of other persons' dinners, and who moreover had wings and claws like a bird, did not appear to be quite intelligible ; they were puzzled to make out the truth of my tale, and renewed their examination of the monster, with an air of stupid wonder. I since heard that not only the lower classes, but others who pride themselves upon their antiquarian knowledge, have been unable to decide what the statue was intended to represent ; and Count Viario, Doctor ——, a friend of his, and the gentleman who related this to me, proceeded to examine it. “There,” said the Doctor, pointing to the knobs which, as I before observed, protruded from the statue, — “there are proofs that this figure was intended to represent disease; these are evidently pustules ; and such was the vivacious imagination of the ancients, that they wished to signify the deformity occasioned by the Elephantiasis in these claws and mis-shapen limbs.”

“But the wings?” said my friend.

“Why, they are likewise the efforts of imagination.”

“ However, the beautiful countenance and matted locks are the attributes of Harpies ? ”

“ The contrast only shows more powerfully the horrors of the disease. ”

“ But why does she grasp the vase, evidently seizing upon it with avidity ? ”

“ That is immaterial ; the figure is an Elephantiasis, and can be nothing else. ” * He said :—but notwithstanding his degree, those Sphinx.

* The French savants who have been making a scientific tour in Greece, likewise decided that the statue represented an Elephantiasis. The accompanying sketch will enable people to judge for themselves.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

left an isolated rocky hill, and on its summit were the walls and deserted houses of an extensive town, still perfect in their external appearance, but so desolate that one might fancy they had lately been depopulated by the plague-fiend. These were the remains of the town of Ægina, as it existed during the period that the Venetians held the Morea. Infested as the seas then were by hands of daring pirates, who used to land on the coast of Greece, and, after plundering the villages, carry off the inhabitants as captives; the natives of the small islands were obliged in self-defence to construct their dwellings on some naturally strong position inland, whence they might be able to repel the attacks of these marauders; and it was only about sixty years ago that the Æginetæ left their stronghold, and established themselves on the seashore, where they were enabled with less difficulty to follow their commercial pursuits. After passing the deserted town, we proceeded over hills and dales, amongst rocks and stunted fir-trees, until Mount Panhellenius and its Temple became visible.

The Temple is on the ridge of a hill, on one side commanding a view of Megara, Salamis, and Athens; and on the other, of the Ægean and part of Ægina, which appears below the spectator, as if on a map. The scene must be lovely during one of the sunsets for which Ægina is so celebrated, when the venerable columns would be gilt by the various tints of evening, and the Athen shore in like manner be brilliant and distinct; but I saw it to disadvantage, a gale of wind was blowing, and the horizon was enveloped in a mist. Twenty-three columns are still erect, and the rubbish having been lately cleared away, the pavement around the temple, and the steps leading to it have been brought to light: a curious water channel was discovered at the same time, conducting to an opening, or well, perhaps connected with a cavern in the rock beneath; or still more probably, merely a sink to carry off the blood of the victims sacrificed at the altar.* The temple is said by Pausanias to have been consecrated by Æacus, King of the Æginetæ, and father of Telamon, whose son Ajax led the troops of Salamis to the Trojan war. This spot has therefore been sacred to Jupiter about 3064 years, but it cannot be supposed that the ruins we see date from so distant a period. Telamon, the son of Æacus, was banished from Ægina as a punishment for the murder of his brother; but having obtained the king's permission to plead his cause, he erected a mound of earth, whence he delivered his justification, which however proved fruitless. A large tumulus is now to be seen on the sea-shore near the port alluded to by Pausanias; and this may possibly be the identical mound raised by the exiled Telamon? Tumuli are the most durable monuments raised by the ingenuity of man; and if belief is attached to the supposition, that those visible on the plains of Troy conceal the ashes of the heroes who perished in the ten years' siege,—why may not this mound be viewed as the work of the same period?

* The basso relievos which adorned the frieze of this Temple are now in the Museum of the King of Bavaria; and it was reported that his Majesty, who is a great Philhellenist, had expressed his intention of restoring them to Greece whenever her government is established.—This, however, seems problematical.

Of the other temples in this island, only that of Venus still presents any remains; it is situated on an elevated point of land near the port, and one solitary shattered column marks the spot where the worshippers of beauty once poured forth their vows. The foundation has been taken away lately for the erection of various public works, and excavations made for this purpose are continued to the depth of twenty feet below the peribolus,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of those islands are inured to the sea from their infancy, and think nothing of sailing from island to island in small boats, which would easily elude the vigilance of Government. Perfect safety from the plague cannot therefore be insured; but at least such precautions might be taken as would put Greece on the same footing as the Ionian Islands, with regard to pratique.

At Syra, the inhabitants have long been aware of the advantages of a quarantine, and once prevented the plague from being communicated to the whole country. A merchant-brig arrived at Smyrna from Egypt, and, upon inquiry, it was ascertained that her crew was infected. Now, although the Turks considered this immaterial, a French man-of-war stationed there obliged the brig instantly to leave the port. She then bore up for Syra, where the local authorities, having ascertained that a man had died on board, not only placed her in quarantine, but would not allow her to leave the harbour until forty days had expired, when they ordered her to depart without communicating with the shore. In the mean time, her character had been spread abroad: at whatever harbour she presented herself, admittance was refused; and, after wandering about the Archipelago like the demon-ship, she was obliged to proceed to Malta, and there perform a second quarantine. About two years ago, an infectious disease, not unlike the plague, manifested itself in Greece; but by the precautions taken, it was prevented from spreading, and in a short time disappeared.

At Ægina, I hired a caique to convey me to Poros,—not one of those light caiques that skim the surface of the Bosphorus, and glide along the water as lightly as if they had wings, but a large clumsy boat without a keel, and carrying a huge unwieldy sail, which, although picturesque in its appearance, seemed to me badly calculated for this season of the year, when squalls are of such frequent occurrence. When we were leaving the harbour, a boat, containing several gentlemen in European attire, ran foul of us. We were soon extricated, but this occurrence gave me an opportunity of remarking the countenance of one of the party, a pale, sickly-looking man apparently about fifty years of age. This person was one of the few men of honour that Greece possesses—one who, during the whole of his political career, maintained an unspotted reputation; was always ready to encounter personal risk in the defence of his country; and who, after holding important situations during seven years, is still as poor in purse as when he landed in Greece. This panegyric, which no other military chieftain deserves, is due to the integrity of Demetrius Ypsilanti.

My boat was manned' by Ipsariots, whose reputation as sailors is uncontested; but the day was so fine, that I hoped I should have no opportunity of seeing it put to the test. A fair wind accompanied us until we had sailed half-way across; but then, a cloud appeared on the high land of Methana, and a white ripple visible on the distant water, created a violent discussion among the crew. One wanted to lower the sail; another laughed at his fears; and all were giving their opinions as loudly as they could:—but the question was soon settled. A furious gust of wind fell suddenly upon us: in an instant the boat was half-filled with water; and but that the prudent sailor had let the sheet fly, we must have gone down in a few seconds. The sea rose, and became a sheet of foam; and without any sail set, we were obliged to scud and seek shelter under the lee of Moni. I seldom witnessed a more tremendous squall. A Russian seventy-four, close to us, with top-gallants sails set, let all her sheets fly, and drove before the wind in the most slovenly manner; whilst H.M.S. Infernal, which like-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ruled by an English or Russian Prince. His arrival is to settle every thing. They are to be paid for their losses, and become rich. Greece is to equip a fleet of fifty sail, in which her sailors will find employment, and a regular army is to be organized. These occurrences are to happen immediately, and then every one will be contented." The Brulotier, when he recapitulated these advantages, spoke with the fire and animation of an ancient orator, his black eyes sparkled, his long hair fell wildly over his shoulders, his gesticulation was forcible, and he summed up his speech by tearing off his shoes, stamping on the deck, and exclaiming, "I had a father, mother, and sister—they have been murdered! I had a home—I have been driven from it for ever. I had a ship—I devoted it to the service of my country. I once was rich, and now am a beggar,—and the Government of the country, for whom I made these sacrifices, refuses to grant a miserable pittance to keep me from starving."

I have often heard similar complaints; but it is impossible for the Government, with its trifling resources and exhausted treasury, fully to remunerate the sufferers by the Revolution. The President might have given those situations to Greeks, who fought during the war, which are now filled by his eight hundred Ionians; but the upper classes, who were gainers by the Revolution, alone met with his encouragement. As for the rest, notwithstanding that they have lost their all in the struggle, they have the right to call themselves free; and although the poor wretches think this but a trifling compensation for their sufferings, the world will tell them that liberty is a blessing never too dearly purchased, and that they will hereafter reap its fruits.

We were nine hours in crossing to the harbour of Poros, which is exceedingly beautiful. The entrance is narrow, and when passed, is concealed by the land, so that the harbour appears as a small lake. To the southward, the lofty mountains of Epidauria hem it in, their summits describing a bold, rocky outline, and their slopes becoming gradually more fertile as they approach the shore, where they are planted with orange groves, olive-trees, and vines, interspersed with gardens and meadows. Damala, the ancient Trœzen, overlooks the harbour; to the westward is the promontory of Methana; and to the north the island of Poros forms a crescent, completely inclosing the lake.

On a steep hill, separated from Epidauria by a narrow channel, at present impassable for large ships, is the town of Poros; the white, flat-roofed houses rise one above the other until terminated like a pyramid, and on the sea-shore are several storehouses constructed by the Russians, and on their departure, to be given up to the Greek Government, whose naval depôt is established here.

Secure within this basin, the Russian squadron of five line-of-battle ships, (three bearing admirals' flags,) and ten smaller vessels, was at anchor; and no inlet being visible, it seemed wonderful how these floating masses could have entered this retired spot. Many boats were plying about; several parties of sailors were on shore, cutting wood, or procuring water, and the scene was so animated, that I quite forgot I was in Greece.

The Russian squadron appeared to be in excellent order; the ships had been refitted preparatory to their return homewards, and now that they were at anchor, looked almost as well as British men-of-war; but the comparison extends no farther; when at sea they are still very clumsy in their manœuvres, and in bad weather their inferiority is still more apparent; but the improvement which has taken place in the Russian ships since they first entered the Mediterranean, is, I am told, wonderful; and this is owing to their having remained so long in company with

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

one fine brig carrying eighteen guns, belonging to Miaulis, and a ship of Tombazi's, likely to share the same fate. The other vessels are rigged as brigs, polaccas, and schooners, and now have nothing warlike about them but their names of Leonidas, Epaminondas, Xenophon, &c. painted on the sterns.

The owners of these vessels are too poor to pay the crews they require; they have not capital enough to begin trade; and they can find no purchasers for their ships, which are therefore a dead loss to them, and will soon only be fit for firewood. Thus Greece, who, from her beautiful harbours and situation, is eminently calculated for a commercial country, who possesses within herself a host of hardy and experienced sailors, and is not deficient in shipping, is in such a morbid state as to be unable to profit by her advantages. Commercial spirit was paralyzed by the war, and has not yet revived; the interests of the mercantile class have not been consulted; and such are the imposts* now laid upon exports and imports, that unless some change is made, commerce, which alone can call forth the latent enterprise of the Greeks, will receive its death-blow.

* During the Turkish rule, Franks paid 3 per cent., and Rayahs, 5 per cent. upon all exports and imports. The Greek Government has increased the tax to 12 per cent.; and the consequence is, that trade has ceased!

The town of Poros is disgustingly filthy ; and the few good houses in it were occupied with billiard-tables for the recreation of the Russians. I heard the unceasing rattle of balls when I walked down the quay ; and the town was full of the fair-haired Muscovites. There was room for me, however, at the miserable inn, where, in an adjoining room, a crowd of Russians were smoking, swearing, and playing at billiards : the landlady, as she informed me, could speak seven different languages ; and, after trying her luck as an innkeeper at Constantino-ple, was now cheating the Russians of as much as she could, previous to their departure. I was seated quietly at dinner, when this naval Moll Flaggon rushed into the room, and, in her dialect—for it was impossible to say that her words belonged to any particular language—she screamed out—“ Is it true—is it true ? ” I felt rather amazed at this visitation, and begged her to explain herself ; when she said, that she had just heard that the President had gone to Ægina ; that he was proclaimed King ; and that he was to be crowned in five days ; and if such was the case, she would start for Ægina next day with all her household, in the hopes of making a little money. Reports like these were constantly circulated.

Oranges and lemons used to be exported in great numbers from Poros to Constantinople, and one or two cargoes were shipping for that port: these appear to be its principal articles of trade. It is considered unhealthy during the summer months, and the heat is excessive; but we ought not to think this surprising, for the Peloponnesians supposed that the nearest road to the infernal regions, and by which Pluto bore Proserpine to his kingdom, was only twelve miles from Poros, near the ancient Hermione.

Poros, known in ancient times by the names of Sphæria and Kalauria, was given by Apollo to Neptune, in exchange for Delphi. A temple of great sanctity, dedicated to the Ocean God, stood on the summit of the highest hill, but it is now a mere heap of ruins. On that height, Demosthenes sought an asylum from the persecution of his enemies; and when he found that even Neptune's protection was of no avail, he swallowed poison, and was buried within the bounds of the temple.

The morning after my arrival at Poros, I purposed to continue my journey towards Argos; and whilst my servant was packing up, I strolled into the principal coffee-house, accom-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

with vines, lemon and orange-groves. The fruit of the latter was hanging in golden clusters upon the branches, and had a striking effect; the surface of the plains was bright with young grass; some fields of wheat were already green,—in others the peasants were employed in ploughing; and the season, which would have been winter in other countries, here bore the attributes of spring. On the slope of a mountain, we saw a square tower with turrets and battlements, like a feudal castle, and around it were the houses of the tenantry, who sought for safety under the protection of its walls. It had evidently been constructed as a fortress in former days, and still retained its importance; the smoke rising from its chimneys betokened it to be inhabited; and it formed, I should think, an apt representation of a military post in the feudal days. But some ignoble Greek was most probably the proprietor of what may have pertained to a Latin count or Venetian noble. Many of these towers are to be seen in Greece; some are of ancient date, whilst others were constructed by the Turks, who feared to live amongst the Greeks without having the power of controlling them. Their origin dates, no doubt, from the year 1210, when the Latins conquered Constantinople, and divided the empire of Greece amongst their leading chieftains, who, being called upon to govern a people in every way averse to them, whose religion was different,—whose manners were polished, whilst theirs were warlike, and who, although effeminate, were dangerous from their numbers,—could only maintain their ascendancy by establishing fortresses in various parts of the Morea, similar to those they had possessed in their native country. But, notwithstanding this precaution, the Latins soon lost their power in Greece; and the means they had taken to enslave the country, were copied by the Greek despots. They built castles on the summit of hills, and collected their tenants around them; and it is worthy of remark, that all the Greek towns which do not stand upon the site of ancient cities, have been built on the slope of hills surmounted by fortresses. The Turks, in 1455, swept away the chieftains who had tyrannized over the serfs, and became the masters of their strongholds; when, finding that the same measures were necessary to control a hostile population, they placed garrisons in the larger castles, and fortified themselves in the villages where they settled.

At about four miles' distance from Poros, we came to Damala, which is romantically situated on the slope of the mountains. In itself, the village is not remarkable ; but the orange-grove near it is the spot where the Greeks, in 1827, held their national assembly ; and in the plain around are to be seen the ruins of one of the most ancient Grecian cities—Trœzen.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

pally with fragments of ancient columns and marbles; and a fresco painting, still visible on the wall, denotes it to have been dedicated to St. George, who is represented on a white horse, spearing the dragon. In this chapel stands an altar, which appeared to have been the pedestal of a statue erected by the people to one of the Roman Emperors. I copied the inscription; but, as was the case with most of those I gave myself the trouble of decyphering, it had been already repeatedly published. Near the banks of the Damala (Chrysorrohes), fragments of walls are to be seen, probably intended to check the inroads of that mountain stream, and for a great distance around the plain is strewed with tiles. A conspicuous ruin beyond the river excited my curiosity; but instead of an ancient edifice, it proved to be the remains of a church dedicated to the Panagia, and burnt by the soldiery during the war. It now affords a shelter to the shepherds who tend their flocks in the plain. Several marbles which had been built in the walls were lying on the ground, and two of them were pedestals of statues. The temple they belonged to must have stood a little above the church, where a stone enclosure seems to mark the space occupied by the peribolus;

the ground is also elevated above the surrounding country by terraces which can be distinctly traced.

I viewed these few remains of Trœzen with great interest ; for many of the romantic tales of the heroic ages were connected with this town. Here it was that Theseus was born : through two apertures in the earth, which are no longer to be seen, Bacchus brought Semele from Hell, and Hercules dragged forth Cerberus. Orestes remained here until he had appeased the manes of Clytemnestra ; and in the plain the unfortunate Hippolytus met with his untimely death. “ There are many people,” said a foreigner to me, “ who having read Racine’s ‘ Phœdre et Hippolite,’ would hasten on their arrival in Greece to view the ruins of Trœzen in preference to those of Athens and Sparta.”

The promontory of Methara is of volcanic origin, and intercepts the view of the Saronic Gulf from Trœzen. On the neck of land connecting it with the continent, Fabvier constructed some fortifications, where he entrenched his regular troops—at the time when Epidauria was the only part of Greece under the control of the national government ; but the Turks did not offer to attack them. Leaving Troezen, we ascended mountains, covered with the rododaphne, arbutus and myrtle, and slept at Potamia, on the brink of a romantic glen. The scenery during our ride next morning was pleasing, but the country seemed quite deserted; the villages we passed were roofless; and but for the tinkling bells of the flocks feeding in the mountains, we might have concluded this district to be uninhabited. This part of Epidauria was peculiarly sacred to Æsculapius, to whom a temple and grove were dedicated near the present village of Lygourio. There were also baths supposed to possess peculiar virtues, and to this spot invalids resorted from every part of Greece. None were allowed to die within the sacred precincts; and the reputation of the God thus escaped uninjured during several centuries. The theatre is stated by Pausanias to excel every other that he had seen, in chasteness of design and architectural merits.

The grove was in a small plain hemmed round by lofty mountains; and when we approached the spot, I looked around in search of the majestic oaks with which my fancy had decorated the plain; but the country here was even more destitute of trees than that we had previously passed. On descending, I however soon perceived that I was

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

not far from the theatre, but it has long since been razed. The sacred grove has likewise disappeared; and now, in the plain around, my attendants were the only living beings.*

Amongst the few ruins worth seeing in Greece, the Theatre of Epidaurus must be classed as one of the first. I have since seen many others; but none of them made such an impression upon my mind as this.

We passed close to Lygourio shortly after leaving the plain, and prosecuted our journey through the same irregular scenery; now crossing a mountain torrent, next ascending a hill: but although we hoped to reach Argos that evening, our delay at Iero had rendered this impossible, and we determined to take up our abode for the night at the monastery of Agios Demetrios, which we understood was not far distant. We accordingly struck off to the right, and on attaining the crest of the hills, beheld the convent close to us. The view from hence was magnificent:—in the foreground stood the monastery on the brink of a glen, planted with orange and olive trees; near it were the picturesque ruins of an ancient church, with the last rays of the sun striking through its arches. Far below us, in the distance, was the lofty Palamide, Nauplia, the Citadel of Argos, the Gulf of Napoli; and the plain bounded by a mountainous range, above which rose Mount Artemesius covered with snow. The tints cast on this by the setting sun were of every hue, and of the most brilliant colour. At one moment they were like gold; then they changed to crimson, and next to pink; and long after the sun had set, and that the plain of Argos and the surrounding hills were grey and indistinct, the pinnacles of the snowy mountains still retained their brilliant painting.

* This spot owed its celebrity to the birth of Æsculapius, who was exposed by his mother Coronis on one of the Epidaurian mountains. A shepherd who had lost one of his flock returned to seek for it, and on the road beheld a beautiful boy with a bright glory round him. This was the future God of Medicine. He passed for the son of Apollo; in time became celebrated for his knowledge of the healing art, and finally was deified.

A Caloyer received us at the convent gate, and hastened to prepare a room, and offer such hospitality as was in his power, not only to me, but also to several muleteers, who likewise craved admittance and lodging for the night. It is the bounden duty of these monks to afford shelter and food to those poor travellers who demand it from them; but since the war, they transgress their rules by receiving money in compensation for their hospitality. This monastery was a very different building to the superh convents of Spain and Italy. The walls were high and loop-holed, and the few small windows that looked outwards were raised high above the ground. In the middle of the inner yard was the church: the ground-floor was used as store-rooms or stables, and along the upper story ran a wooden gallery, communicating with the cells of the Caloyers. This distribution of the building calculated it to become a strong military post; and during the Revolution, the monks having armed themselves, and taken fifty Albanians into their pay, were enabled three times to repel the attacks of detachments from the Turkish army. The monastery is said to be rich in landed property; and the two hundred monks belonging to it, were at this time absent in various parts of the country, tilling their land for the ensuing year.

On a little green knoll adjoining the monastery stands the ruined church before alluded to, which the monks informed me was destroyed in the old times before the Venetians left the Morea. Part of it is so well constructed with alternate layers of brick and stone, that I should think it must have been constructed during the times of the Greek Empire. Two

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Venetian construction, and is capable of containing a numerous garrison; but having been unoccupied for many years, the tanks by which its defenders were supplied with water are now useless. One of these in the upper citadel is of a singular construction, and being coated with ancient cement, may probably have been formed when the citadel was first erected. Prince Ypsilanti gallantly threw himself into this fortress, in the hopes of checking the advance of the Turkish army under Kourdschid Pacha, in 1822; but, having neither water nor provisions, he could only maintain himself there during a few days. The view from the citadel is very extensive. On the side of the hill below the citadel is the theatre, the seats are cut out of the solid rock,—there are seventy ranges; but, although the most ancient, it is the least beautiful of all the Grecian theatres. It had lately been cleared out for the reception of the National Assembly. Very extensive brick ruins adjoin the theatre; they contain some curious subterranean passages and a tessellated pavement. Veli Pacha caused an excavation to be made here, and was rewarded for his labour by the discovery of some ancient statues; but as a great part of the ruins are still unexplored, more might possibly be extracted from them. In this direction are also to be seen the remains of a small octagonal temple.

A few yards to the north of the theatre is the building called an oracular shrine by Dr. Clarke; but there is every reason to believe that he is mistaken in his supposition. Dr. Clarke mentions a ruined wall below the citadel, which he concluded formed part of the ancient fortifications; but it appeared to us that, the town being defended by the fortress, these were unnecessary; and they proved to be the remains of an aqueduct. Curiosity induced us to trace its course; and we found that it terminated in the concealed passage of the oracular shrine, which Clarke imagined was intended for the reception of the priests who delivered the oracles: in the other direction, the aqueduct may be traced to the banks of the Inachus; it then winds along the sides of the mountains for five or six miles, until it crosses the Charadrus in the valley near Katubeles, and from thence the direction it takes is towards a glen in the mountains, whence rushes a stream of water, which undoubtedly used to be conducted by means of the aqueduct to Argos. This rivulet must be the Cephissus, and the supposed shrine is most probably the temple of that God, thus described by Pausanias.

“ In going thither, you leave on your right a temple dedicated to the river Cephissus, who, the Argives say, was more than once destroyed by Neptune, although they know very well that this river flows underneath the temple. I saw there, I believe, a head of Medusa, made of marble, and which is said to have been the work of the Cyclops. Behind the temple is a spot even now called the Audience Chamber, because Hypermnestra was tried there after she had been accused by her father Danaüs. The theatre is not far from thence.” The Cyclopiian wall in front of the building must have supported the ancient temple, and the niche for a statue most probably contained that of the river Cephissus, there being sufficient space for a recumbent figure. That part of the temple which is cut out of the rock may be the chamber alluded to by Pausanias. In speaking of this shrine, Clarke dilates with much satisfaction upon the proof that it afforded of the manner in which the impostures of the priests were concealed from the people: but the termination of the aqueduct in this passage is a fact which will unfortunately militate against his conclusions.

A monastery, built on the brink of a precipice half-way up the Larissa hill, is supposed

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

The 6th of January is the Christmas Day of the Greek Church, and for forty days previous they keep a strict fast. On this day, Argos offered a busy scene: every one was dressed in his best attire, and a great variety of costume was to be seen. Some were preparing kids, or pork, for the evening's repast; others assembled round the wine houses; all were laughing, talking, or singing; and before noon there were many who had lifted the wine cup once too often. The young women of Argos hastened to the side of the Larissa hill, and there, in front of the "Oracular shrine," they joined hands, and singing their national airs, commenced dancing the monotonous but graceful Romaika. I sat within the ancient temple, on the spot where once stood the image of the God; and when I looked down upon the circling group before me, I pictured to myself a similar dance performed on the same spot twenty centuries before, then in honour of an idol, now in commemoration of the birth of our Saviour; and I could not refrain from thinking that custom might have consecrated this place as the site of the dance and revelry, and that it was not mere chance which had caused its selection. As the women whirled round and round in the mystic dance, now gently chanting a song, then elevating their voices in full chorus, some young men sprang into the circle and joined the girls; others followed; and at last I counted fifty-six persons dancing together, and revolving round a centre in a double circle. The pivot was a little child barely able to stand; some older children were next to him, then came the maidens, after them the matrons, and finally the men. The costumes of the women were varied, and had apparently been transmitted from mother to daughter for many generations; but it was rather incongruous to see a rich dress of crimson velvet and a fur tippet thrown over a ragged petticoat; and a poor girl, whose entire wardrobe consisted in what she had on, bedizened with a tawdry handkerchief wrapped round her hair. The sturdy peasants were likewise decked with their best clothes; and it was a truly pleasant sight to see them enjoying themselves after their preceding toils. But, alas! I saw not one pretty female face! Ladies of Argos, where is your beauty?—where the arched eyebrows, fair complexions, and rosy cheeks of your Athenian sisters? In the rugged countenances of the men, I could trace the reckless audacity of the Klepht, the careless habits of the Palicar, and the patient disposition of the hind, and in each there was an expression not devoid of manly beauty ; but the women, I regret to say, were ugly—their features were coarse, and bore the appearance of premature old age ; their complexions were bronzed ; and many girls, not twenty years of age, seemed care-worn and faded.

The theatre was not far distant, and I sat down on one of the ancient seats whence I could embrace at one glance the various scenes that were taking place. Whilst thus occupied, I was accosted by a respectably dressed young man, who, after the first salutation, begged that I would explain to him what the ruins were which he saw below us. “ We are at present,” continued he, “ in a very backward and ignorant state ; but I hope that before long we shall be better acquainted with every thing belonging to our own country. I feel ashamed that a stranger should have given me the history of such a ruin as this, when I, a Greek, ought to have been able to explain it to him ; but I am labouring to make up for my deficiency.” I was pleased with the intelligent manner of this youth, and upon questioning him ascertained that his brother was master of the school at Argos, and that he who so candidly

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

dren at their backs, and heavy bundles on their heads, were toiling along on foot. A gentleman of my acquaintance witnessed a still more forcible illustration of this feeling. He was walking in the country, when he found his progress stopped by a mountain torrent of considerable depth running across the road; and at the same instant a Greek and his wife arrived at the opposite bank and prepared to cross it; but instead of the man assisting the woman, he jumped upon her shoulders, and made her carry him over. The women, however, do not complain: and once when I asked an intelligent little person why she worked so hard whilst her husband was idle, she answered that it was "her duty."

* * * *

At three miles' distance from Argos is a spot called the Fount of Erasinus, where that river, which is supposed to be connected with the Lake Stymphalus, terminates its subterranean course, and gushes from a mass of rock. The body of water is very considerable, and so much above the level of the plain of Argos, that it might with ease be made applicable to the purposes of irrigation, though at present it merely is of use in turning some mills. An aqueduct had been kept in repair by Greeks, Romans, and Venetians, and used to supply the town with water from hence; but now the stream loses itself in the plain below, near the Marsh of Lerna, about a mile distant: immediately above the source are two enormous caves, and one contains a small chapel. A miserable Pappa was the guardian of this shrine, and in the adjoining cavern, of sufficient size to contain two or three hundred people, I perceived by the uncertain light of a fire at its extremity, several poor women and children who had made this den their home. Here it was that Colcocotroni, in June 1822, took up a position with the few troops he had hastily assembled, and, aided by Ypsilanti, kept the Turks in check until they were obliged to retire through the defiles near Corinth, where they met with their memorable defeat from the Greeks under Niketas. The ground is very strong, the left being defended by a precipitous mountain, and the right by the various trenches of the Erasinus, and the Marsh of Lerna. The latter retains the bad reputation it had in the olden time, and the Hydra's hundred heads still infect the country with their pestilential breath; but, in the progress of civilization, a remedy may be found for this evil. The waters now stagnating in the marsh might be led into the sea, and much fine land would no doubt be recovered. The evil has of course been much magnified during the last few centuries, when the population, instead of increasing in the same ratio as in other countries, has diminished, and that consequently less territory is necessary for its support. Beyond the marsh, on Mount Pontinus, are the ruins of a Venetian fort; and on the shore a village and some mills (whence the name of Mylæ) have been rendered celebrated by the gallant opposition offered there by Ypsilanti and some other chieftains, to the advance of Ibrahim's army in 1825.

My next excursion from Argos was to the west, along the banks of the Inachus, which, to judge by the depth and width of its bed, should be a river of some importance; but even now, in the midst of January, it was quite dry — the fall of the ground is so rapid, that the water collected by the melting of the snows or rain in the mountains is carried off in a very few hours; and as it rushes down with great violence, a channel is formed quite disproportionate to the body of water it conveys. Our principal object for proceeding in this direction, which is not possessed of any classical interest, was to view the cave in which a celebrated Greek chief,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

reload, the position was forced, and an indiscriminate slaughter took place of all those whose flight had not been successful. Jocrisse, with two hundred of his immediate followers, hastened towards the cave he had already prepared as a place of refuge, and it being only three miles from Argos, he reached it in safety. Towards this spot we walked; and when we entered the wild valley, formed by the rugged mountains bordering the Inachus, my companion pointed to a tremendous cliff, quite perpendicular, and four or five hundred feet high: above it rose a rocky peak; whilst below, a rapid slope led to the banks of the Inachus. Midway up this gigantic wall, I saw a small black speck like an opening in the rock, such as would be a fit place for the eagle to build his nest, quite secure from the intrusions of men, and this proved to be the cavern. As we climbed up the mountain, and approached the base of the precipice, I could more distinctly perceive a flight of steps leading to the cave, an olive-tree grew at its mouth, and a wall partly closed the entrance. At the foot of the precipice were the remains of some huts which had afforded a temporary shelter to that portion of the Argives who claimed the protection of Jocrisse, and some small cavities in the adjoin-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

In this singular spot, two hundred men, with women and children, established themselves: they succeeded in hoisting two brass guns into their airy fortification — they supplied it with three months' provisions: their commanding situation, embracing a view of the Argolic plain and valley of the Inachus, rendered a surprisal impossible; and if they were attacked, they could draw up the ladder, shut the upper gate, and destroy the assailants by a desperate fire from above. Nothing can give a better idea of the determination with which the Greeks avoided all compromise with their persecutors, and of the privations they endured, than the sight of this cavern. Driven as they were from their valleys, their houses destroyed, and their crops trampled under foot, the poor peasants felt happy in obtaining a refuge in their mountain caves: they thus also rescued their flocks of sheep from the grasp of the enemy; and although they were exposed to the chill air of the mountains, and to the extremes of heat and cold—although their aged people fell victims to the hardships they encountered, and that their offspring were, in like manner, the victims of misery, freedom, even thus qualified, was better than slavery. The various mountains of the Morea are full of caves, which at times have been the home of the population; and even now the smoke that sometimes is seen curling above their dark entrances, and the human figures standing near, point them out as the residence of shepherds whose flocks are feeding in the valleys beneath.

In the earliest ages, before the Egyptians sent their colonies to Greece, and that the rude inhabitants were instructed in the social arts, these caverns formed their dwelling-places; and when the minds of men became refined, and that they gave a loose to the play of their imagination, they peopled these dens with the fertile creations of romance and superstition. Each cave had its Faun or Dryad,—each fountain its Nymph. I viewed the descent from the cave with some degree of trepidation; but when I recollected that the Greek women were daily in the habit of going up and down the steps with their children on their backs, I was ashamed of my alarm, and by refraining from looking downwards, reached the bottom in safety. On our return we crossed the Inachus, near the ruins of the aqueduct, and on the present road to Tripolizza observed where the tracts of ancient chariot wheels are deeply worn in the rock. Near this, Mr. Dawkins discovered a small square tower of Cyclopiian construction, which had hitherto escaped the remarks of travellers: it is a perfect specimen of that style of architecture, and is twenty feet square. One side of a door, seven feet from the ground, is still standing, but the remainder has fallen, and the interior is so completely filled up by the soil washed from the mountains, that it is impossible to say whether we see the base of the tower or not. It must have been intended for the defence of the road from Argos to Mantinea.

The ruins of the ancient city of Mycenæ, the capital of Agamemnon, are only five miles to the northward of Argos, on the verge of the plain, where it is terminated by a steep range of hills. On our way thither we crossed the Inachus and Charadrus, and, to our right, left the remains of the Hæroum, or Temple of Juno, which, after being fruitlessly sought for by Gell, Leake, and Dodwell, have since been discovered, and two columns are still erect. Mycenæ is a most interesting sight: its situation is romantic; the bed of a mountain torrent defends one side, on the other is a deep valley, and the steep hill girt round with the massive walls of the citadel commands the entrance of a desolate defile. We first examined the prin-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

formed of huge stones placed one upon the other, without cement; their magnitude is surprising; and the ancients, on learning that they were constructed by people called Cyclops, were justified in believing that the architects must have been of greater size than the generality of mortals, for in later ages the construction of such works as these would have been regarded as an endless labour. History informs us that Mycenæ was founded three thousand years ago; and when we consider what the nations of Europe were at that time, we cannot but feel a certain degree of respect for those people who, at such an early period, could construct works like these. Mycenæ was destroyed by the Argives; 568 B. C.; since then, it has been uninhabited, and this circumstance renders still more surprising the perfect state of its walls. Three ranges of these can be traced; and there is a second gate on the north-west face of the citadel, in good preservation.

A few hundred yards from Mycenæ, on the slope of a hill, is the entrance to the extraordinary tomb that has so much excited the curiosity and doubts of antiquaries, and been known as the treasury of Atreus, but is now called the tomb of Agamemnon. The entrance to this sepulchre, like that at Mycenæ, is formed of one enormous stone resting upon two others, and is wider at the base than at the top: the upper stone is twenty-seven feet long, seventeen feet wide, about four feet and a half thick, and weighs one hundred and thirty-six tons! The interior of the sepulchre consists of a chamber built in the form of a cone, from the apex of which to the ground, measures more than fifty feet. The walls are built with stones carefully fitted together, and were formerly covered with brass plates, fastened by nails of the same metal. We caused a fire to be lit in the interior of the tomb, and were enabled to see a smaller chamber cut out of the rock, and communicating with the tomb by a small door. Here it was supposed that the treasures of Atreus were concealed, being defended from danger by the sacredness attached to the abode of the dead. That the tomb should have contained the remains of the "King of Men," seems liable to doubt, as three similar edifices are to be seen not far distant, but they are all in ruins.

Who the wonderful Cyclops were that raised these extraordinary edifices, is still undecided; and the only information transmitted by ancient authors is, that they were supposed to have fortified Mycenæ and Tiryns, 1379 years B. C.

The citadel of Tiryns is in the plain on the roadside from Argos to Nauplia. Though of much less extent than Mycenæ, the enormous walls, their height and durability, are equally calculated to excite astonishment. In one place, where a tower is nearly perfect, the wall is about forty feet high, and instead of being perpendicular, inclines outwards, as if to prevent an assailant from availing himself of the interstices of the stones to climb up to the rampart. A road wound round the tower into the upper citadel, but there are no gates now visible. Two extraordinary galleries have been brought to light by the destruction of a part of the walls; they ran round the north and eastern sides of the citadel, and were probably intended as places of concealment, but they are particularly singular as representing the first approximation made by early architects to the form of an arch: the upper stones meet, but instead of being square, are cut on one side so as to have almost a triangular shape, giving to the gallery the shape of a cone. The citadel of Tiryns could never have been taken by assault during the infancy of the art of war, but was most probably starved into a surrender; it fell

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

CHAPTER V.

Napoli di Romania.—The Palamide.—Colocotroni attacks Griva, and is repulsed.—State of society at Napoli.—Greek ladies.—Deficiency of education.—Greek troops.—Regular forces.—Infantry.—Cavalry.—Pay of the army.—Leave Napoli.—Plain of Argos.

NAPOLI DI ROMANIA (by the Greeks still called Nauplia) was the capital of the Morea during the Venetian rule; and its excellent harbour, commanding position, and strong fortifications, rendered it the maritime key of the Peloponessus during the late wars. Its possession generally conferred the control over the rest of the peninsula; and thus it was a constant source of contention between the hostile parties. The Turks only surrendered it when a strict blockade left them no alternative but to submit or perish by famine, which had already made such havoc in their force, that when the Greeks escalated the Palamide, they found only a few miserable wretches still alive, and these had been feeding on the corpses of their comrades! Napoli is six miles distant from Argos, and built on a rocky point of land jutting into the gulf, and surrounded with strong fortifications of Venetian construction: it has only one assailable point, where a narrow isthmus connects it with the main land, and this is overlooked by a rocky precipice surmounted by the citadel of the Palamide, which, like Ehrenbretstein, is defended on three sides by perpendicular rocks, and on the fourth by extensive fortifications. When I approached the gates of Napoli, I observed that, as at Corfu, the winged lion of St. Mark, fixed in different parts of the walls, formed a record of the fallen power of Venice; and when I passed through the gate, I found myself in a narrow, dirty street full of people, and from whence the sea breeze is excluded by the upper stories of the houses projecting one above the other, until they almost meet. Some of these are of Venetian construction, but the greater part are Turkish, and very different from the light, well-built houses of Constantinople. A mosque and its taper minaret likewise remain, in evidence that the Turks were once masters here, and one or two marble fountains, such as the Turks are in the habit of placing in their streets and market-places, are still unhurt; but these probably are the only monuments which twenty years hence will remain to show that, during four centuries, Greece was the slave of Turkey. No other nation, after ruling a country for so long a space of time, left such slight traces behind them as the Ottomans. I traversed the whole of Greece, without seeing a single public work that would hereafter say that such people were. Far from improving the countries they governed, they scathed every thing that came within their influence; and, to use the words of an accomplished observer, "they may be compared to flights of locusts eating up and destroying whatever they came near, conferring no benefits in return; and at last, when swept from the face of the earth by some kindly blast, only remembered from the havoc they had committed."

Since Napoli became the seat of Government, a few improvements have been made in the town. The most influential, and therefore richest Greeks, have constructed some good houses: Colocotroni has established himself there. An excellent barrack for the troops is building; and a respectable mansion has been

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of the Venetians, when their sole object was to protect the country from external foes by maritime fortresses, and render the succour of their navies available, should they have to repress a popular insurrection, Napoli di Romania was a well-chosen post; and Modon, Coron, and Navarin were constructed for the same purpose; but these reasons cannot actuate the Greek rulers. Their views must be more expansive: they must take into consideration the future prospects of Greece—that she possesses an enterprising people, a fertile soil, excellent harbours,—every thing, in fact, that Nature can bestow to make a flourishing nation; and the capital must be chosen with reference to the Greece of fifty years hence. It is amidst the ruins of Athens that the sovereign of Greece should erect his throne.

The ancient name of Nauplia has been absorbed in its modern appellative. It was constructed by Nauplius, the son of Neptune, some years before the siege of Troy; and the extensive Cyclopiian walls, intermixed with the Venetian fortifications of the upper town, are proofs of its just claims to antiquity. The town is supplied with water by a stream issuing from the celebrated fountain Canãthos, which however no longer possesses the virtues it was famed for in the heathen time.

The Palamide is of Venetian origin, and is ascended on the town side by several flights of steps cut in the rock. I gave myself the trouble of climbing up to the gate, but, in consequence of the absence of the commandant, I was not admitted; I however consoled myself with the magnificent view of the surrounding country. The works are capable of containing a numerous garrison, and against the irregular Greek troops might be easily defended; so that when Griva, the Roumeliot chieftain, obtained possession of them in 1827, Colocotroni, who was at the head of the Moreot party, finding it impossible to drive him thence by force, had recourse to treachery.

Colocotroni was at this period quartered in Argos with his retainers, and conceiving that Griva's lieutenant could not resist the temptation of a large bribe, he sent to sound him whether, in consideration of a certain sum, he would deliver up the citadel. The officer acquainted Griva with this proceeding, and was directed by the chief apparently to acquiesce in Colocotroni's proposition, to make the best bargain he could, and cheat the Moreot out of as much money as possible, but to acquaint him with all the plans agreed upon. The lieutenant instantly professed to enter into Colocotroni's views, but gave him to understand that his good-will must be dearly purchased; and twenty-five thousand piastres, and a pair of diamond-mounted pistols worth as many more, were sent to him. The lieutenant and Colocotroni then arranged their plot. The gates of the Palamide were to be left open, and the men withdrawn by Griva's deputy, on a certain night at a fixed hour. Colocotroni's troops were to advance and take possession of the works; and when their success was complete, five guns were to be fired from the fortress, as a signal that Colocotroni might then send to occupy the town.

Griva meanwhile made his preparations: his troops were all concealed; the night, which was dark, hid his position; he threw open the gates, and shortly afterwards Colocotroni's detachment entered the Palamide. The stillness, the absence of Griva's men, and the easy manner in which they had been allowed to enter the works, created a suspicion that all was not right; some of the men hesitated to advance, and others spoke about a retreat, when Griva's voice was heard aloud, calling upon his Palicari to fire. Then from every quarter around, the fire of musketry

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

several people of influence waited upon Griva to request that he would allow young Colocotroni to depart ; and after much entreaty he consented ; but so little did Colocotroni rely upon Griva's word, that he would not stir from his fortified house until Griva's son came, and walked arm in arm with him out of the gates, at the head of the Moreot soldiers. Such were the contests which agitated the Greek chieftains, when almost the whole of their country was in the power of the enemy.

The little society that Greece can boast is assembled at Napoli, where there are about thirty ladies, some of whom speak French, and the others Italian ; but they are still far behind the rest of the world in accomplishments ; their natural tact and shrewdness of character enables them, however, at once to perceive in what they are deficient, and they strive as much as is within their power to correct their faults ; but a different tone must be given to society, before the ladies can acquire the degree of influence they ought to possess over the minds of the men. It will be a gratifying task for the future princess of Greece to enlighten the minds and form the manners of the rising female generation ; and a very few years will suffice to create a great change for the better. Were a school to be formed on the model of that at St. Petersburg, where young ladies of noble family are educated with the greatest strictness, and where merit is always rewarded, the spirit of emulation acting upon the natural quickness of the Greeks, would bring forth all the good qualities and talent now latent in the minds of the “beau sexe,” overpowered by sluggishness, bad habits, and a hopeless feeling of inferiority. I consider the education of the women to be one of the first steps towards the regeneration of the men, who will not willingly resign the control which, in imitation of their Turkish masters, they have gained over their countrywomen; but when the latter are gifted with a superior education, talent and acquirements must give them the ascendancy. Pride will then urge the men to place themselves at least on a par with the weaker sex; and they will be able to acquire knowledge at home far more beneficial than if they were to be entirely educated abroad. Foreign education, unless there is something to counterbalance it in Greece, injures rather than improves them. After a long absence, they return to their country with European feelings and acquirements, and finding themselves in the midst of an ignorant and presumptuous people, they with little difficulty, by humouring their passions, render them subservient to their superior talents. Thus they acquire an ascendancy which fosters their innate genius for intrigue : their vices increase with their success ; personal aggrandizement, at whatever cost, is their object ; they lose sight of their country's welfare ; and, instead of becoming ornaments to it, they keep it in a constant state of mental conflagration.

The Greek ladies were so unaccustomed to society, that they at first looked upon the chance of meeting a number of strangers, with dread : the young girls were never seen. So little did they understand the unmeaning attentions which common politeness induces a well-bred man to pay unto a lady, that they always suspected him of some sinister design. . “ He is a dissembler,” they said ; “ he is trying to conceal his real projects by flattery ; he is a politico.” And even now they are often so strongly impressed with the sense of their deficiency in polite acquirements, that they are ashamed to dance, because they think they will be laughed at, and do not like to converse in a foreign language from a similar reason ; refinement having made so little progress in society, that they dread the sneers and criticisms of each other. “ I would rather,”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

had undoubtedly often occupied her thoughts, and I asked her whether she approved of the custom of "betrothing," or whether she did not think it much more natural that a person should select a husband for herself? But, civilized as she otherwise was, on this point, barbarism still predominated. "It is much better," said she, "that our parents should choose for us; our partiality for any one person would induce us to overlook his faults; and then, when they became apparent, we should blame ourselves for our blindness."

"But then you have no affection for the person to whom you are united for life; and instead of confiding in your husband, you find him a perfect stranger?"

"Not so," interrupted the brother; "my sister is right,—we are often betrothed to each other from our infancy; and although it is true that the youth is never allowed to speak to his intended, and that he does not even see her but by accident, yet she learns through their mutual acquaintance what are the leading traits of his character, and on them models her efforts to please; whilst he, on the other hand, knowing himself to be already engaged, never allows his fancy to stray in search of a mistress."

“But,” answered I, “if the young lady deems it necessary that she should study her husband’s character, and try to please him, why should she not do so from her own experience? why not judge for herself, instead of trusting to the reports of others?”

“Such is the established custom; and we see no reason to alter it.”

“Sometimes, however, she may chance to love another person?”

“We never love,” said the sister,—“we know not what love is.”

There was no replying to the last argument, which convinced me that the Greek ladies were indeed very backward in the scale of civilization.*

* Apropos to marriage, I must relate an instance of a ludicrous nature, which occurred just before I arrived at Argos. Colonel G—— had two Moslem servants; the one his groom, and the other a negress. Whether it was sympathy or love, it is impossible to say; but in such wise did the swarthy charms of the latter act upon the mind of the stable-keeper, that he offered himself in marriage, and was accepted. But how were the necessary formalities to be gone through? they were the only Mahomedans in the country; they had no friends of their own religion to invite to the feast. In this dilemma, they resolved to be united by a Greek priest, and Colonel G—— promised to furnish the bridal supper. The knot was duly tied; the happy couple sat down to the feast provided for them, and (hear it, Mahomet!) they ate as much

In fact, I believe that there are few countries where woman is less respected than here ; her situation, generally speaking, being little better than that of a slave ; not of such slaves as adorn the harem of a Turk, and who are nursed with the tenderest care, and pampered with every luxury, but of those who toil and drudge in the fields of an unfeeling barbarian. I have seen several parts of the world ; but amongst the Caribs, the Caffres, or the various nations of the East, I do not recollect to have witnessed a stronger line drawn between the male and female sex than in Greece. This evil, though fast disappearing amongst the upper classes, is still deeply rooted in the populace, and may be traced to the state of subjection in which they were kept by the Turks. The Greek who cringed beneath the imperious commands of his tyrant, acted in a despotic manner, within his own house, to those dependent on him ; and provided that, in imitation of his masters, he could sit cross-legged smoking his pipe, he cared not how much his wife and daughters might toil ; but where the Greeks were less exposed to Turkish influence, the women were better treated ; and in Maina pork as would have contented four Greeks after a forty days' fast, and drank such a quantity of wine, that they amply repaid themselves for years of previous abstinence.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

such prisoners, enjoy a degree of liberty which is little understood in Europe: they walk out whenever they please, they are perfect mistresses of the house, and can, if they choose, exclude their husbands from their apartments. Many of the Greeks have but little more similarity to European habits.

I have often met *arobas full of laughing young Turkish ladies, driving outside of Constantinople, unattended by a guardian — they were going to enjoy a party of pleasure on the banks of the Bosphorus, or perhaps were merely taking exercise; but during the whole time that I was at Constantinople, I do not recollect seeing any Greek ladies walking or riding about:—they remained shut up in their houses, their sole occupation being that of looking through the jalousies of their windows to see what was going forward, and who was passing in the dirtiest street of a place which has not improperly been called “L'égout de l'Europe.” An English gentleman, who had taken a house in a retired part of Pera, was remonstrated with by a Greek lady — “Your wife will never be able to bear that stupid house,” said she; “it does not look out on the street.”

A few Greek ladies may be met at the houses of the different ambassadors at Constantinople, but they are mostly the wives or daughters of persons attached to the embassies, and cannot be considered as genuine samples of the Grecian fair, who live quite amongst themselves within the precincts of the Fanar.*

* Covered carriages.

One advice I would give the Greek ladies is to take care that the Turks do not overtake them in the march of civilization. This is an event which once would have been deemed impossible; but when I left Constantinople, the Capitan Pacha was going to give a ball, where they were to be present in galleries; and Mr. Calosso assured me, that when he asked the Sultan whether they were to join in the dance, he only laughed, and said, "It is not time yet."

At Napoli, society is improving: balls have been given, at which the ladies danced; and in the course of time, I suppose, they will entirely divest themselves of their antiquated prejudices.

* The Fanariot Greeks are well educated. The principal families fled to Odessa at the commencement of the Revolution, and are now hastening to Greece; and as they have for the greater part retained their property, their arrival will create a great change for the better in society. Prince Mavrocordato has lately married a lady belonging to one of these families, who is highly accomplished — it was quite a love match: so all the Greek ladies are not quite as insensible to the influence of the tender passion as was my little friend.

Napoli is at this moment the head-quarters of the regular army, and it likewise contains a school for military instruction, containing about fifty scholars. Generals Træzel and Gerard, both very distinguished French officers, are now at the head of the Greek regular force, but this force only amounts to fifteen or eighteen hundred men, and though so few in number, they are badly paid, and worse clothed;—that such should be the case, reflects much upon the conduct of the President, who being well aware how perfectly useless the irregular forces are to Greece at the present moment, persists in keeping a force of several thousand men under arms.* What his object is, no one can say. France and England have pledged themselves to defend the integrity of the Greek state; and with such powerful protectors, he well knows, that he has nothing to fear from external foes: the Palicari, who, if disbanded, would probably resume their agricultural pursuits, find that it is much more agreeable to remain idle, and be well paid; and feeling that they possess the power of enforcing

* The Eubœans have a right to expect pay and employment from the Government, whilst their country is occupied by the Turks; but this case does not apply to the inhabitants of other districts.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

an inferior class to the Palicari, and that a man who once enlists is a slave for life: such erroneous impressions, indeed, appear to exist relative to the regular troops, that it is evident no pains whatever have been taken to organize them. The manner in which the regulars are clad, and their general appearance, certainly is not likely to impress the mind of a peasant with the same feeling of respect as when he sees a Palicar with his fustanella, pistols, and touphaic. The soldiers are dressed in the European style, but so shabbily, that they have not a martial bearing, and appear to great disadvantage near one of the common peasantry. The anxiety of the Greek government to introduce European customs into Greece, made them commit an error in the equipment of their troops, which, however trivial it may appear, has great weight in the eyes of that class from whence the soldiers must be recruited. I allude to their not having dressed the regulars in the fustanella, or philibeg. It is the national costume and favourite dress of the warlike class of Greeks. Nothing can be more soldier-like, and at the same time better adapted to the mountainous country in which they have to act; it leaves their limbs free, and we well know, by the example of our Highland regiments, that it does not fetter their courage. Many Greeks confessed to me, that one of their principal reasons for disliking the Tacticoes, was the abandonment of the national garb;—there certainly exists a strong prejudice against them.

With the exception of a few French officers, who are intermixed with the Greeks, and whose military mien only makes the others appear to still greater disadvantage, the officers of the regular regiments are a motley crew, even more in want of instruction than the men;—they are dirty, badly dressed, and when commanding their troops, apparently quite ignorant of their professional duties. The fact is, that with the exception of the French, the officers of these regiments have no claim whatever to military rank; they have never served—have evidently never been drilled—are not gentlemen, and are composed principally of a crowd of applicants whom the President, not knowing otherwise how to dispose of, nominated to commissions in battalions where there were no men. I believe that, if well, that is to say, strictly commanded, the Greeks would make excellent soldiers and officers; but the whole management of the army must be changed; and unless the command of the different battalions is given to French or English officers, with full powers to eject all those useless beings who now possess commissions, Greece will never have an army. It is not however force alone that must be used with Greek soldiers; persuasion and flattery judiciously administered, will have far more effect; for, whatever may be their failings, they have much personal pride, and deeply feel an insult.

A private soldier in the regular army receives one piastre (three-pence halfpenny) per day, and a ration of two pounds and a quarter of flour; he is supplied with a jacket, a cap, and three pair of trowsers, by the Government; but for his shoes, and other equipments, he is obliged to pay out of his miserable pittance; so that his pay is almost nominal.

The few troops at present composing the regular force are scattered throughout the fortresses of the Morea: some are at Patras, others occupy the Morea Castle, Corinth, Napoli, Modon, and Coron. The army is to consist of ten thousand men, which is a larger force than Greece, with her present population of seven hundred and fifty thousand, is capable of supporting. One regiment of cavalry has been formed, under the command of Colonel Pelion, a French officer, who in the Peninsula, and at

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

their equipments by the French to Greece, but they are mostly old ; and when unfit for service, I know not how they can be replaced, for there are no horses fit for cavalry in Greece at present. There are one hundred and seventy horses in the regiment, formed into two troops of lancers, and two of dragoons. As long as Greece merely raises troops to carry on a defensive war, a couple of cavalry regiments will be quite sufficient, the ground her armies would have to combat in being mountainous and easily defended against cavalry ; but when she feels herself strong enough not only to repel aggression, but to pursue her foes into the plains of Thessaly, it will be necessary for her to strengthen this arm.

A corps of artillery is organizing.

The road from Napoli to Argos runs through the plains on the brink of the sea shore, but the ground being here extremely marshy, there are times, after a fall of rain, when it is barely passable. The Venetians had constructed two paved causeways through the swamp, but they are so full of holes that it is dangerous to ride over them ; and thus the communication between the two most populous towns in Greece, though only six miles in length, is almost obstructed. As all the produce of the plain of Argos finds a mart at Napoli, it is surprising that a little trouble should not have been taken to ameliorate this wretched road. The Greeks, however, do not care how bad the roads are; and answered my remark relative to this one, with—“ True, it is bad now, but you should see it in summer!”

Before leaving the plain of Argos, I must enumerate its various capabilities. The plain contains about forty square miles of arable land, and a great portion of it may be irrigated. The soil is not very rich, and requires to be left fallow after a crop of wheat; but as it is never manured, this is not surprising. Tobacco, rice, maize, wheat, and cotton, are produced; but so very ignorant are the Greek husbandmen of the improvements which have taken place in the agricultural system, that they do not derive half the advantages they ought from their property. Their plough is the same kind of implement that it was in the days of Triptolemus; and the ground is so easily worked, that their ingenuity has not been exerted to improve it. They have no hedges or fences, and dung lies in heaps in their houses and streets, but is never employed as manure. A vegetable garden is seldom seen: provided, indeed, that they grow sufficient provision for their families they care not about the other resources their ground offers to them; but this proceeds, I think, more from ignorance than sloth. Silk used to be made at Argos, and a few mulberry trees still remain; but the orange groves and orchards surrounding the town, were used as fuel, or wantonly destroyed during the war. A great part of the plain of Argos is now government property.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

cloaks and blankets, did not anticipate much inconvenience from the cold, although the snowy tops of Mount Artemesius declared that the temperature would be more chilly in that vicinity than in the sheltered plain of Argos. We were anxious to visit Mantinea, in the plain of Tripolizza, and wished to proceed thither by the Tsipiana pass; but our guides declared that the snow rendered it impassable, and we then followed the road to Portes. The day, was fine when we left Argos; but we had not proceeded a couple of miles before the rain fell in torrents. Mount Artemesius, which we were to ascend, was covered with clouds, and we began to fear that the predictions of our Argos friends were about to be verified. We sought shelter at Katableis, a small village which had escaped from Ibrahim's incendiaries, and there the Pappas received us in a comfortable cottage—lit an excellent fire, and enabled us to dry our saturated clothes. He consoled us for our misfortunes, by declaring that the morrow, being New Year's day, (old style)* we were sure of having fine weather; and his prediction was fortunately verified.

We ascended the pass I have before described, and on our way met an old Greek armed with a wretched gun, with which he was going to shoot partridges. The unblushing poacher showed us the manner he approached a covey unseen: he had two sticks with him, fixed crossways, and covered with a brown cloth: this he carried before him, and when he came near enough to the birds, he used it as a screen, and then aiming through a hole made for that purpose, sometimes, as he declared, slaughtered fifteen partridges at one shot.

* The Greeks have not adopted the new style in computing their years.

We had no difficulty in ascending the pass; the snow had almost all melted from the ridge, although higher up it covered the mountains; and the fog clearing away, enabled us to enjoy the magnificent view, and to congratulate ourselves upon having such a fine day to cross the mountains, which at this season are often impassable. We left Sangeh on our right, and entered a small plain, for the time converted into a swamp by numerous springs issuing from the mountains, and which, having no outlet, are here collected. One of these, where a stream of pure water gushes from the earth, is the fountain of Arne, the spot where Rhea was delivered of Neptune, and having concealed him in a sheepfold, persuaded Saturn that she had brought forth a colt, which she gave him to devour. On the mountain bounding the plain to the eastward, we saw the monastery and large village of Tsipiana, and a little beyond it we came to the plain of Tripolizza. It is about two miles wide in this part; and the mountains rise from it abruptly, and are desolate and cheerless. The plain was cultivated, but there was little verdure to be seen, and no wood, and the scene altogether was dreary in the extreme. It has been called the Yorkshire of Greece; but I do not see in what the similarity consists.

We entered the plain near the ruins of Mantinea, which, in common with many other ancient ruins, has received the indefinite name of Palæopolis. The walls are to be distinctly traced, although only rising a few feet above the surrounding country; and at every thirty yards are the remains of a tower. The river Ophis, although quite full, was so narrow that we jumped over it: it divides into two branches on reaching the walls, and after encircling the city, reunites, and finally disappears in a chasm. At this point, various travellers have supposed that they could trace a small mound raised by Agesipolis to stop its course; but if ever such existed, it could not have answered the purpose intended. The interior of the walls is strown with bricks and stones; but with the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

On leaving Mantinea we traversed part of the plain through vineyards and corn-fields which were completely flooded: the rain of the preceding day had filled the springs; the rivulets had overflowed, and we experienced the greatest difficulty in wading through the water and mud, until we arrived at part of the plain where a hill juts into it, and considerably diminishes the width. This was the site of the memorable battle of Mantinea, and the slope of the mountain was probably the spot where the great Theban expired—justly exclaiming that he left two immortal daughters, Leuctra and Mantinea.

Tripolizza is seven miles from Mantinea: we reached it at sunset; and having letters to the governor, obtained a comfortable house for the night. Misery, filth, ruined walls, crumbling houses, and muddy streets, were the prominent characteristics of Tripolizza. At the doors of a few new houses, we saw some pretty women dressed in holiday clothes, in honour of the new year, and sounds of merriment issued from many wretched hovels. Mirth, however, amidst the surrounding desolation seemed quite fiendish, and we could not but remember with horror the dreadful massacre which took place here in 1821. We walked round the ruins of the town, and saw mosques and churches, harems and towers, all mixed in one indiscriminate mass. What the Greeks had spared, Ibrahim, when he evacuated the town, literally demolished—the fortifications, that they might not be of service to the Greeks; the mosques, to prevent their being defiled by the infidels.

When we reflect upon the massacre of Tripolizza, it displays forcibly the similarity in the character of the ancient and modern Greeks; and whatever may be said to prove that the Greeks of to-day are not descended from those of early times, at least, it is impossible to deny that they possess the impetuous passions of the ancient Peloponnesians. How often in ancient history do we not read a tale of broken faith, rapine, murder, and violation! how often do not the historians of old speak with complacency of the murders and atrocities committed by their countrymen! Not a single tree is to be seen at Tripolizza—not even one dark cypress, the usual ornament to the last homes of the Mahomedan dead; nor did I see one turbaned pillar marking a Moslem's tomb: these memorials of the Turks, light as they were, had also been swept away.*

* An anecdote was related to me which proves that there was some pity shown by the Greeks at Tripolizza. A gentleman who was travelling in Greece, and trusting to the inhabitants for hospitality, on stopping at a little village near Caritena, asked his entertainer to sit down and partake of his dinner; at the same time requesting him to relate what adventures had happened to him during the war. The other complied; and having waited until the room was cleared of listeners, he exclaimed, “I am a Turk! When Tripolizza was stormed, I shut myself up with my master in his house: we fought for some time; my master was killed, and at last I surrendered my sword to a Greek: he likewise begged for my pistols—I gave them; and then he requested that I would give him what money I had: it was a request I took good care not to refuse. ‘Now,’ said the Greek, ‘do not be alarmed, for I will take care of you:’ he kept me by his side during the slaughter that occurred; and when urged by some Capitani to put me to death, he steadily refused to do so—I followed him to his village. Five years afterwards, Ibrahim’s troops approached it, and amongst them were some Turks who knew me of old. ‘Ha! Mustapha,’ said they, ‘what are you doing amongst those Giaours? come and join us:’ however, I reasoned with myself, and said, these Greeks are masters of the land now—I shall do wiser to remain where I am; besides which, I had taken a liking to the prettiest girl in the village: so, all things considered, I resolved to stop where I was. My Turkish friends went away; and I went to the church to be baptized. I entered it Mustapha and a Mussulman,—and I came out of it Spiro, and a Christian; and when I am a little richer, I intend to get married.”

The ruins of the Pekul Pasha Mosque were full of marble fragments, most probably the spoils of the Temple of Minerva, at Tegea; and

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

that they required was a military control over their subjects ; this Tripolizza, from its central position, afforded them, and thus they made it their capital.

Great wealth accrued to the chiefs by the plunder of Tripolizza. The peasants, who knew not the value of precious stones, offered diamonds for sale at one or two shillings each ; and a pair of diamond-mounted pistols worth fifty thousand piastres, was sold for six thousand. Colocotroni amassed an immense booty here ; and from being a pennyless Klepht has become the richest man in Greece. The plunder the Greeks at various times acquired not having been drawn from the country, it is evident that there must be a great deal of capital now concealed in Greece ;* but the Greeks are so afraid of appearing rich, that when they do amass a little money, they immediately bury it, and hide even from their dearest friends where it is concealed. The Turks, also, buried their money ; and the Palicari used never to enter a house without running their ramrods into the floor, in the hopes of finding treasure.

* During the two years that Ibrahim possessed the Morea, the Greeks were obliged to expend their wealth in purchasing provision ; but there is undoubtedly a great deal still left.

A Turkish gentleman, at the commencement of the war, buried a large sum of money in a certain part of his house, which was destroyed during the contest. Being afraid of trusting himself in the power of the Greeks, he was unable to seek for his treasure; but when hostilities ceased, he wrote to some European officers who were stationed near his house, offering them half of his wealth provided they would dig it up, and transmit the remainder to him. The bargain was made; the officers easily found the spot indicated, but the money had already been taken. “Fool that I was,” said the Turk, when he heard of his misfortune—“I entrusted my dearest friend with my secret!”

The Greeks are more cautious in keeping a secret, for not even the fear of approaching death will induce them to disclose the site of their hoarded wealth; as an instance which occurred lately near Argos will testify. There was an old Greek, apparently in the greatest misery, who was taken very ill, and in a few days his life was despaired of: his friends assembled round him; and when they acquainted him that there was no hope, said, that he ought to make what arrangements he wished, relative to his property, and declare whether he had any money concealed. “Money!” exclaimed the wretch ; “ I am so poor, that I have not enough to pay the expenses of my funeral—I am not worth a single para. How should I get money ? ”—The relations still urged him to confess, but he resolutely refused compliance. Next day he became worse, and on the following morning, finding that death was at hand, he called one of his relations, told him “ to search near the large olive-tree in the garden,” and shortly afterwards expired. Not far from the olive-tree a jar was found containing two hundred dollars !

We had no inducement to prolong our stay amid the ruins of Tripolizza, and on the 13th resumed our journey ; but we had only advanced four miles, and reached the banks of a small lake called Taca, into which the Alpheus flows, when the mountains became darkened by clouds, the thunder pealed, and we had barely time to seek shelter in a miserable hut when the storm burst ; snow fell on the mountains, and sleet in the plain ; and we saw that we must resolve to pass the day where we were, in company with bipeds, quadrupeds, and fowls of every kind ; in fact, the hut contained not only the family, but the rightful inhabitants of the cow-house, pig-sty, and stable, who however seemed to be firmly united with their mas-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

their services are estimated, it would effectually cure their Philhellenism.

Some of the Moreot peasants carry their enthusiasm in favour of the President to rather an extraordinary excess, if we may believe an anecdote related to me. A print-seller at Napoli received a number of engravings from France, which he exhibited at his shop windows for sale; there were likenesses of the Kings of England and France, the Emperor of Russia, and Capo d'Istrias. A country hind, who had entered Napoli for the purpose of expending a few piastres in purchasing clothes, having stopped at the shop to gaze at the pictures, inquired who they were intended to represent, and a bystander informed him. No sooner did he hear the President's name mentioned than he rushed into the shop, paid six piastres for the print, and forgetting his intended purchases, ran out of the town, exclaiming, 'The Turks beat and robbed me, the Roumeliots plundered and maltreated me, and my prayers were of no avail: but Capo d'Istrias came, and my troubles ceased!—He shall be my God—him will I worship.'" It is not surprising that the peasants, who have scarcely been taxed, and have in fact been quite their own masters during the last two years, should speak in favour of a person who has made them believe that the liberation of Greece was owing to his exertions.

Only a portion of the arable land in the plain of Tripolizza is now cultivated, there being such a scarcity of cattle in the country that they have not oxen enough for agricultural purposes: its principal produce is corn; and there are likewise a few vineyards in the vicinity of the town. The wants of the peasants are but few, and these easily supplied: their food is generally coarse bread, and cheese; and three or four times a year they gorge themselves with fat pork, and drink as much wine as they can procure; thus by their occasional excesses rewarding themselves from their previous abstinence: the clothes they wear are all worked by the women of the family.

The marriages of the peasants are conducted on the same system as those of the better classes. The contract is first entered into between the parents, and when the preliminaries are arranged, the bridegroom sends his intended spouse a ring tied to the end of a handkerchief—this constitutes the betrothal; from that moment the man is debarred from her sight, and the doors of her father's house are shut against him until the termination of from six to twelve months, as may have been agreed upon, when the marriage takes place, and all the family attend the wedding. Our hostess had four sons and three daughters: two of the latter were married; but the third, though twenty years of age, not being yet provided with a sufficient wardrobe, her marriage was deferred until the ensuing year, when they hoped, by manual industry, to have equipped the young lady as became a bride. She was to have four chemises, two coarse cloth dresses, and one fine wedding gown—the latter, after being worn on all holidays, would be transmitted as a legacy to the daughters. Until the young lady was disposed of, her four brothers were obliged to remain single, the ladies of a family being always married off first.

At daybreak on the 14th we hastened from the pig-sty where we had passed the night, and rode along the bank of the Saranda Potamo, which we crossed repeatedly: this river often swells so rapidly as to endanger the lives of those who are travelling near it: after a heavy fall of snow or rain, a vast body of water rushes down it, and disappears in a chasm at the end of the plain of Tripolizza: it continues a subterraneous course, until it unites with the Taca Lake, when it again sinks, and finally emerges from the ground in the plain of Megalopolis,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

traced the winding course of the Eurotas during many a mile, and looking towards the spot where Sparta stood, tried to distinguish its ruins: to the N. E. we saw the hills above Londari, and to the southward, in the extreme distance, the highlands of Cerigo. Bruliah, a romantic village with its houses scattered over the slopes of the hills, and intermixed with olive trees, occupied the foreground; and all around the country was broken into ravines and glens well wooded with a variety of trees. After leaving the bleak, inhospitable plain of Tripolizza, this transition from gloom to cheerfulness was most pleasing, and the scene amply repaid us for our preceding day's misery.

Our reception by the inhabitants of Bruliah was very hospitable: a young woman conducted us to her house, and prepared it for our reception—she had beautiful features, fine black eyes, and a pleasing address, but her misfortunes during the war had left a melancholy impression on her countenance. When Ibrahim invaded the country, Bruliah was one of the most flourishing villages in the Morea, but one night it was surprised by the Arabs; sixty persons were carried into slavery, and many were killed, amongst whom was the husband of our hostess: such of the inhabitants as could escape, fled to the impenetrable recesses of Maina; and when, after three years' exile, they ventured to return, sad must have been their feelings on contemplating the wreck of their homes, and they bitterly lamented the slavery of their kindred.*

A poor woman came to us with a present of fruit, and she told us, with tears in her eyes, that her four children had been carried away by Ibrahim, and that she was now childless.

Ibrahim certainly did not pursue a vacillating system: he said he would destroy Greece; and fearfully did he redeem his promise: yet this wretch, to whom the shedding of innocent blood is as nought,—who could calmly look upon the burning villages, devastated fields, and mangled bodies of those whom he doomed to destruction,—this man is considered one of the most enlightened chieftains in the Turkish empire. If the curses of the childless, the widowed, and the fatherless be of any avail, Ibrahim has a dreadful weight of malediction hanging over him.

* We had not been long seated, when a handsome little boy entered the room with his present for the Milordos: when told to shut the door, he answered with truly Spartan brevity, "I won't," and then strutted forward to offer us a small bird he had just killed and prepared for the spit—showing even at his early age a spirit that would not brook control; and that he possessed a proper sense of hospitality.

The road from Bruliah down to the banks of the Eurotas was varied and beautiful. After ascending and descending several small hills, we came to one overlooking the Eurotas, where it is hemmed in by an opposite ridge of hills, and rushes through the glen with great rapidity. Over it there is a curious bridge of Venetian construction, consisting of one large arch, stretching from bank to bank, and four smaller ones. The banks of the river are lined with shrubs, and several masses of rocks rise above the bridge, and give it an air of peculiar wildness and beauty. When we advanced beyond this, we entered a cultivated track: the left bank of the river seemed populous and fertile, and we saw several groves of olive and mulberry trees. Our road led along the right bank of the Eurotas, which is bounded by the hilly ground falling from Mount Taygetus; but it having appeared to us that we were not proceeding in a direct line towards Mistra, we inquired the reason of our deviation from the established track, and were informed by Theodore that he had brought us by a circuitous route, in order that we might see an old fort called Magula; we therefore continued following the banks of the Eurotas, until we came to a small rivulet running into it; and having then turned to the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

cepting the shelter his house afforded, he should feel most happy in conducting us thither. We gratefully availed ourselves of his offer, and were soon installed in a small house containing but one room. On the door we observed an ancient basso relievo, which induced us to think favourably of the degree of civilization to which our host had attained, and his speaking French and Italian were proofs that he was superior to the class of men we had been in the habit of meeting; but he was so inquisitive, that I did him the injustice of supposing that he was a mere employé of the police: his subsequent conduct proved, however, that his questions emanated from a desire to improve himself, and that he acted towards us with disinterested hospitality. His father and brothers held situations under government: in their absence he was master of the house; and as such, he said that he felt happy in affording us a home during our stay at Mistra. He offered to act as our cicerone; and as he was versed in the legends relative to all the ruins around, and that, moreover, the few ancient sculptures which Mistra possesses were likewise known to him, we found him an extremely useful person.

The rain fell so violently during the first day of our stay at Mistra, that we were obliged to remain within doors ; the whole country was enveloped in a mist, and we could not even distinguish the citadel, so we amused ourselves by conversing with Mr. Theodoraki. “ Ah ! ” said he, “ I am so anxious to see England ! I wish so much to improve myself ! and yet I am obliged to remain here amongst an ignorant people who are a prey to superstition, whilst in England alone true philosophy is to be found. I, however, try to acquire information, for I am convinced of the benefits of education ; and you may see that I possess books.” He produced them ; they were the Confessions of Rousseau ! “ But tell me,” continued he, “ is it true that you choose your own wives, and converse with them before marriage ? we consider it very malhonnête :—and do you really believe in Jesus ? ” We replied in the affirmative. “ Ah ! is it possible ! I have heard that people die from disappointed love, if their parents refuse consent to their marriage ; but I cannot understand it. Do men look upon women with respect, in England ? Do you think that the passion of love, such as it is described, is conducive to the happiness of mankind ? ” We tried to explain some of these mystical points which so much puzzled him ; and then he showed us a little book written by Tri-coupi, in Greek, and published at Ægina : the contents, he informed us, were the history of an English Milordo, who was very rich, and died at Missolonghi. This was the Life of Byron. Notwithstanding his abuse of the superstitious rites practised by his countrymen, I observed that he certainly judged it prudent to follow them. At night, a painting, representing the Panagia, was illuminated by a lamp; and before he retired to rest, he made as many genuflexions before it as would have done for a Mahomedan in the holy temple at Mecca; and crossed himself with such rapidity, during a full quarter of an hour, that I became tired of counting the number of his signs. His servants afterwards came forward and performed the same ceremony; and then, under the protection of the Panagia, we all laid down in the same apartment, and resigned ourselves to sleep.

Mistra has a most striking appearance; and Captain Gordon, who had lately been travelling in Spain, found a great similarity between it and Granada. It is, or I should say was, built on the side of a precipitous mountain, and the summit is crowned by a fortress with towers and turrets in the ancient style, which forming a black mass, relieved by the snowy peaks of Pentydactylon, has a magnificent effect: below the castle the ruins of the town commence

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

S. Fremont.

—dilapidated towers, broken arches, hanging gardens, or rather terraces which once supported them, present a scene of desolation, that seems to have been effected by some supernatural power, instead of by the will of man. One or two gloomy cypresses here and there contrasted their black foliage with the dazzling whiteness of the distant snow, but no smoke rising from the town bespoke its occupation; not a single being moved amidst its blackened and crumbling walls: it was a perfect solitude. On the southern side of the castle the mountain is separated from its natural range by a tremendous chasm, apparently formed by an earthquake: the mountain is literally rent asunder, leaving a perpendicular precipice several hundred feet high; and below runs a plentiful stream, separating the old town from what was formerly a suburb, but is now the only inhabited part of Mistra: a curious bridge of one arch connects the two banks. At some distance beyond this is another suburb, surrounded by orange groves; the trees were in full bearing, and the golden fruit hung in beautiful clusters on their branches, but the gardens they belonged to were overrun with weeds, and the houses were in ruins. Four times did Ibrahim enter Mistra, and on each occasion the inhabitants fled to the mountains, and be`set fire to whatever houses had escaped from his former conflagrations; but the castle, defended by a few Greeks, always resisted his efforts to capture it.

The weather having cleared up a little, we resolved to stroll amongst the ruins of the old town, and climb up to the castle. Most of the houses were built upon arched foundations, which being now disclosed, looked like the mysterious recesses of a feudal castle, and the towers intended for the defence of the street, with loopholed walls, contributed to give the town the semblance of an ancient fortress. There are several old Greek churches in the town, conspicuous from their numerous domes and quaint style of architecture: that called the metropolitan church, near where the Bishop of Sparta resides, is a strange old building, apparently constructed during the lower empire. The pavement is partly tessellated, the pillars are surmounted with capitals of various designs, neither Greek, Tuscan, nor Gothic, but truly barbarous; and on some are inscribed, in the incomprehensible Greek of the middle ages, the names of those persons who granted donations to the church. Higher up the hill are the ruins of an extensive palace, in which are many traces of gothic architecture; and here it must have

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

out attempting to defend the citadel, and the Greeks immediately occupied it, and restored the fortifications.

Mistra, in 1821, contained 20,000 inhabitants, but has now no more than 1500; the rest were mostly Turks, who fled at the breaking out of the Revolution, and their property is in the hands of Government. Logotheti is at present the commissary extraordinary of this district; and although he received us very graciously, yet I could not forget that to his unprincipled ambition was owing the dreadful massacre at Scio. He it was who, with a small body of Palicars, landed in the island, and tried to excite the inhabitants to revolt; and then, having succeeded in making them rise against the Turkish authorities, was the first to fly and desert them when danger became imminent. He was surrounded by numerous armed Mainote retainers, who amused themselves in the evening by discharging their pistols in the streets, in honour of the Epiphany; but although they are not famed for the urbanity of their manners, none of them passed us without saluting and wishing us good day. We remarked, indeed, that all the Mistriots were very respectful. At seven o'clock in the evening the curfew bell sounded; and after that warning, none of the Mistrisots dared to leave their houses, as any persons found strolling through the streets would be taken up by the guards. This regulation appeared to be just the same that existed in our country eight centuries ago, and was quite in character with the ruins we had been examining in the morning.

The 17th was the Epiphany of the Greek church, and early in the morning, whilst we were dressing, six Pappas entered the room, bearing in their hands a crucifix, a basin of holy water, and a bunch of flowers, with which they sprinkled the water about the room: Mr. Theodoraki and his servants then advanced, and the priests made the figure of a cross on their foreheads, and pronounced a benediction, which was requited by the gift of a few paras: another detachment, armed in a similar manner, came shortly afterwards, and renewed the ceremony; but, as we were heretics, they did not offer to bless us. This ceremony, in commemoration of the Baptism of Our Saviour, is performed once annually by all the priests of the town; but, in addition to this, the priests of the parish pay a monthly visit to their flock, and having purified their mansion with holy water, receive some trifling remuneration, which, however inconsiderable, is their principal source of revenue. After this we proceeded, under the guidance of Mr. Theodoraki, to see the few ancient marbles discovered here. We hoped that, amongst the ruins of the old town, we might have discovered some of the spoils of Sparta, but our search was fruitless. Our cicerone first pointed out to us, at the foot of the walls of the old town, a beautiful marble sarcophagus, now used as a cistern. It was six feet long, and three wide: one face represented a dance of Bacchanalians; but the figures, though well executed, were much mutilated. On the opposite side were two winged dragons resting their claws on a spiral ornament standing between them, and at the extremities of the sarcophagus were two sphinxes. At another fountain there is a basso relievo representing three boys supporting a garland; and I likewise saw a head of Bacchus, ten inches high; but the Turks, in their religious zeal, had dreadfully mutilated it. These, and a few fragments of marble columns, here and there built into the walls, are all the relics that Mistra possesses of the ancient arts.

The rain that hitherto detained us at Mistra having ceased, we mounted our horses, and proceeded through the beautiful plain to revisit the ruins of Sparta. Near the banks of

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Theatre. At their base flows the Eurotas, and around them is the fertile plain of Mistra. On these hills the city was built; and although the walls could not have embraced the whole of the ancient town, yet they enabled us to trace its probable outline. They are evidently the work of the lower ages, in many places upon a Greek foundation, and are formed of brick mixed with fragments of columns, marble tablets, &c. In one part of the walls, we saw the headless statue of a man clad in the toga; and near it were several marble slabs with inscriptions, but so mutilated, evidently by design, that it was impossible to decypher them. These are probably the remains of the Abbé Fourmont's destructive labours, as described by Dodwell. We likewise saw in another part of the ruins an inscription apparently recording some act of the city; the letters were six inches long, but half of the slab was broken off.

Several elevated spots indicate the site of temples, from whence the stones had been taken to build the walls: on one of them were two entrances formed of three enormous stones, as at Mycenæ, and leading into an open space in front of the temple: the steps of the temple still remain. On the south side of the town is an enclosure in the shape of a parallelogram, having on one side a range of vaulted chambers: this must have been one of the public institutions connected with the exercises of the Spartan youth, perhaps the Hippodrome; but there is no possibility of ascertaining positively what its purposes were, as Pausanias does not mention any similar edifice;—however, the French savants who have lately examined Sparta, may be able to throw some light on the subject. Outside of the walls is a square building constructed with ancient fragments, and near it an edifice supposed to be the tomb of Pausanias and Leonidas. These ruins are all that is to be seen at Sparta; but there must be a mine of antiquarian wealth not far below the surface, else how can we account for the disappearance of the enormous columns which supported the ancient temples? We saw some broken shafts of columns of so large a size, that they would not be removed for the purpose of building a distant town, when more portable materials were procurable; and we may therefore suppose that when Sparta was deserted, the houses (being most probably in great part built of mud) formed, when they fell, an extra layer of soil to the depth of many feet, and thus concealed the prostrate remains of the public edifices and temples. We know that at Athens the soil has accumulated to the depth of thirty feet. From Sparta we rode towards a village called Cologonia, near the junction of the Scattias with the Eurotas ; and close to a clump of poplars, on the banks of the river, we were shown a broken marble sarcophagus, discovered accidentally a year ago. The sides are sculptured ; but so much of the upper part is broken, that we could only distinguish the lower extremities of the figures. On one side we traced warriors fighting, a river god, some females, and the base of an altar ; and at the end is a spirited figure of a horse. What renders this sarcophagus very singular is, that on two sides the sculpture has been finished, whilst on the other it is merely sketched. The spot where the sarcophagus was found, agrees with the site of the Platinistas, and it may have pertained to some of the monuments mentioned by Pausanias as existing there. Mr. Gropius told me that near Amyclæ, at Leftka, there is a tomb similar to that of Agamemnon ; but we had not time to proceed thither.

I was highly gratified with what we saw of Sparta : not only was there much to admire in the surrounding scenery, but there was also in the ruins of Sparta more to be seen than I had anticipated, and with the aid of fancy I supplied

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

on the ensuing day, and in the evening the inhabitants were called upon to illuminate.*

* Pouqueville's account of Mistra is a tissue of lies : it is a pity that the Modern Traveller should have given him a place in his well-selected pages. He speaks of Sparta as being on the same spot as Mistra, and calls the Scattias the Eurotas.

CHAPTER VII.

Ceremony in the Metropolitan Church.—Revenues of the priests.—Present state of the Greek Church.—Mavromichalis, or Petro Bey.—Remarks on the necessity of colonizing Greece.—We leave Mistra.—Cypress-tree at Trupæ.—Fount of the Eurotas.—Sleep at Spanèika.—Londari.—Megalopolis.—Caritena.—Character of Colocotroni.—Temple of Apollo, at Bassæ.—Khan in the plain of Tripolizza.—We reach Argos.

ON the morning of the Epiphany, we accompanied our landlord to the Metropolitan Church, to witness the ceremony of the Baptism of the Cross, as emblematical of that of Our Saviour. The whole population of Mistra had assembled here, and the church was crowded to such an excess that many of the congregation were obliged to remain round the door without the hopes of getting in; they however had the kindness to make way for us, and we obtained a place near the altar. As is usual in Greece, the women were separated from the men ; the latter stood in the aisle bearing tapers in their hands ; but the former, who, I regretted to observe, wore Turkish veils, were sitting in the galleries. The scene was one of peculiar interest, as it enabled us to see the wild mountaineers of these regions in a different light to what is generally expected from them. Here they came to humble themselves before their God : we had generally heard of them as robbers and murderers.

The service was long ; and, at one part of it, prayers were recited for the sovereigns of England, France, and Russia, as well as for the President ; and to these it appeared that the peasants listened with more attention than to the remainder of the service. A lad twelve years of age, dressed in the garb of the church, then stepped forward, and hurried through a sermon ; and the bishop and his attendant priest, after receiving the sacrament, advanced from behind the screen, which in Greek churches separates the congregation from the altar, and proceeded to sanctify a vase full of water placed in the middle of the church. During the ceremony, the image of a dove bearing a piece of paper in its beak, inscribed with the Word of God, was lowered from the ceiling, and three times dipped in the water, to the edification of the gaping

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

they are at present in the hands of Government, and their produce is to be employed in furthering the improvement of education. The Pappas, in like manner, depend upon the generosity of their parishioners for support.

The debased state of the Greek Church at the present moment, may, I think, be considered a fortunate circumstance, as it will enable the future government to model and arrange their church establishment in the manner best suited to the interests of the country. The ignorance of the clergy is deplorable; and even the people feel less respect for their pastors than in any other Christian country. Their education has never been attended to; and it sufficed, if a person wished to take orders, that he should be able to perform the mummeries practised by the church, and recite a few prayers.* Their income being of a precarious nature, they are all cultivators and landed proprietors; and although after ordination they may no longer marry, their being married before does not prevent their admission within the Church. Formerly, Greece was overrun with ignorant priests and monks; and in several towns there were almost as many churches as houses; but the Revolution has considerably diminished this evil ; and the present Government having prohibited the ordination of priests for the present, it is to be hoped that this useless, ignorant race will gradually disappear.

* A seminary has been established at Ægina, which contains ten or twelve scholars.

Education, which is so much talked about, and so little attended to in Greece, should commence with the clergy. A seminary ought to be established solely for the instruction of the candidates for holy orders, and the expenses might easily be defrayed by the lands of the Church. The superintendence of such an establishment ought not to be placed in the hands of the priesthood ; for, in that case, it would become a mere nest of superstition ; but there should be a controlling power exercised by the Government, and a liberal system of education enforced, and no priests should be ordained until they had passed a strict examination, not only in theology, but in foreign languages, and subjects of general information. They then might be appointed to churches, where their learning would enable them to superintend the education and morals of their parishioners, neither of which have hitherto been thought of ;—indeed, it says much in favour of the Greeks, that none of their virtues are the result of instruction,—they are indigenous, and the growth of their own good dispositions.

The Government has acted wisely in seizing the church lands; and hereafter it ought to acknowledge no priests but those of its own nomination; by this means a reform may probably be effected in the ecclesiastical system, enabling the peasant to devote that time to labour, which is now absorbed in the holidays of the Church. There are not less than one hundred and eighty-two holidays kept by the Greeks, when they are perfectly idle. If we consider what a dreadful loss of time this is, we cannot but hope that, with the progress of education, it will become apparent that a system so monstrous in its details is not calculated for the interests of a rising nation; and as the diminution of the Festas cannot interfere with the prerogatives of the clergy, they perhaps may lend their sanction to a change in their number. This alteration might be effected by adopting the new style, and seizing that opportunity to throw three or four saints' days into one.

An ecclesiastical court, composed of three bishops, at present superintends the affairs of the Church; but, although they disclaim the right of the Patriarch of Constantinople to interfere with the temporalities of the Church, they still refer to him on all spiritual matters. Even this nominal interference ought, if pos-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

bestows upon them, the government need feel no compunction in proscribing their vitiated communities.

It is already contemplated by the liberal Greeks to effect a reform in their churches, and emancipate themselves from the authority of the Patriarch, but much opposition is manifested by the bishops and principal dignitaries of the church, who affect to view any innovation on their religion as sacrilege. Although so perfectly ignorant themselves of what their religion is founded upon, that they only know it by the ceremonies that they perform, they profess to consider any attempt at reform as an heretical invasion. The President having judiciously taken possession of the church lands, disgusted many of the bishops, who view with jealousy any encroachment upon their prerogatives, and are anxious still to hold their investiture from the Patriarch, as it only requires a well-furnished purse to ensure their nomination. It however is evident, that nothing can be so injudicious as to allow a Patriarch nominated by and in the interest of the Porte, to have the spiritual control of the Greek nation; and enlightened men are all of opinion that the Greek Church ought to have its chief in Greece, as it is undoubtedly contrary to the canons of the Church, that their Patriarch should be nominated by an infidel. On the other hand, it is feared that this will create a schism, there being three million two hundred and fifty thousand Asiatic Greeks who would recognise the Patriarch, whilst Greece could only number seven hundred and fifty thousand.

We felt considerable regret at not having it in our power to visit the territory of Maina, the highlands of Greece; but even if our time had not been limited, at this season of the year, it would have been far from pleasant to travel amongst the snowy ridges of Mount Taygetus: but the Mainotes are already ceasing to form a distinct class from the rest of the Greeks; and old Petro Bey, (Mavromichalis,) who has ceded his power over them to the government, and lives quietly at Napoli di Romania, upon being asked whether he thought they would change their habits, replied, “Do you think that we will continue to live amidst our barren mountains, now that the plains are open to us? No,—we loved Maina, because it was the land of liberty! but, now that freedom is to be enjoyed in a more productive part of Greece, we shall gradually descend to the valleys.” Notwithstanding the distinguished part that Mavromichalis took in the revolutionary contest, he is strongly suspected of looking back with regret to the good old times when he was Bey of Maina, and possessed of sovereign authority. His official functions are now merely those of a senator, and, instead of having any weight in the government, he is considered as a cypher. His own words will best describe his sentiments. A friend of his paid him a visit one day at a new house he had constructed, and remarked to Mavromichalis, that he thought it extremely comfortable;—"Yes," answered the chief, "but you should have seen me in my Beyship of Maina."—"How!" said his friend, "do you regret former times? What then induced you to rise against the Porte?"—"Why the fact is, that although I was already powerful and rich, I wished to become more so; a crowd of agents surrounded me, and promised that I should be made Prince of Greece; so I threw myself headlong into the Revolution. — What has been the result? My son was killed. I was used as a tool until my services were no longer required; and now I am a mere man of dirt."

An excursion to Maina being out of the question, we resolved upon proceeding to Londari, in the plain of Megalopolis, and therefore turned away from the beautiful valley of the Eurotas.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ficient number of labourers for their cultivation, and this arrangement would entail but little difficulty upon them, as the island of Matra could easily supply several hundred industrious families; and after the first year, the produce of the land would be sufficient to support them. An English speculator, instead of seeking in America the means of increasing his capital, might here invest it in the purchase of property in one of the most favoured countries in Europe; and the distance from England is so slight, that a person might come out in fourteen days, view the different parts of the country, select a spot calculated to meet his views, (weighing well the possibility of irrigation, and the facilities offered for the disposal of his produce,) and, having possessed himself of the necessary information, return to England within three months. It would be unnecessary for him to enter into any extraordinary expenses for agricultural implements, those used in the country being sufficient until a year's experience had taught him what would be most useful. Tobacco, wheat, oil, cotton, wine, silk, are but a few of the articles produced in Greece, which in able hands might be turned to the greatest advantage; and the first cost of his establishment would be trifling, as the price of building is inconsiderable: the houses are of fragile materials,—but, for the first few years, this would be immaterial. A house calculated for a small family may be built for fifty or sixty pounds, and those for his tenantry would not cost one-third of that sum.

The advantages that would accrue to Greece by the introduction of monied men amongst the agricultural class are manifold. The Greek peasants at present, in many respects, are not undeserving the name which their ancestors bestowed upon the polished Persians—“Barbarians.” They pride themselves upon being distinct from Europeans.* Their manners are still Asiatic—they have no idea how to employ their money; and when by their industry they have succeeded in saving a few dollars, instead of laying them out in the purchase of land, in improving their houses, or educating their children, they bury their treasure in the ground,

* They always call the inhabitants of Christendom Europeans, as if they were themselves Asiatics. A Greek gentleman belonging to one of the ancient families of the Fanar was visited by an old Moreot, who expressed himself delighted to see him; but, on remarking that he was dressed in the Frank costume, observed—“Why do you wear those clothes just like an European? recollect that you are a Greek!”

and only occasionally spend a portion of it in purchasing a fine dress for holidays. A man whose house is not worth ten dollars, will spend a hundred in purchasing an embroidered dress.

The first symptoms of civilization in a barbarous nation is a demand for the conveniences and luxuries of life, and to this state the Greek husbandman has not yet attained: by following the path of his fathers, he secures to himself provisions and clothing, and he looks not beyond them: he is content to live in a miserable hut, amidst his pigs and poultry, rather than, by calling his energies into play, rise from his degraded state. He cultivates the lands that his ancestors cleared; but, although he has sufficient time to plant a great deal more, he will not do so. He is content to wallow in filth, and wear his unwashed clothes until they literally fall off him, provided that three or four times a year he can appear decked out in finery; he is, in fine, but little removed in his wants and habits from a savage; and I have seen many nations whom we stigmatize as uncivilized, that were not more so than the Greeks. Now, were Europeans to settle in the country, and avail themselves of the capabilities of the soil, the Greeks, who at first would be surprised at their strange customs, yet on viewing the benefits

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of 1,800,000*l.*, for which they now stand pledged to the holders of Greek bonds; and the national purse, delivered from this dead weight, would derive an increased revenue in proportion to the augmented produce of the ground.

On the 19th we took leave of Mr. Theodoraki, who obstinately refused to accept any remuneration for the trouble we had given him, but expressed a hope that we would sometimes remember the young Spartan. We however gave his servants some money; and when he heard that we had done so, he ran after us, apparently much annoyed, and exclaimed, "Monsieur, vous avez deshonoré ma maison."

Previous to entering the road to Londari, we went to see a magnificent cypress-tree situated in a romantic glen a mile from Mistra, at a place called Trupæ. Through the glen ran a torrent, and among the rocks were pine and fir-trees, but above them all the cypress raised its head. The ruins of a small mosque were near the tree, and here, under the shade of its drooping branches, the Mistriot Turks were wont to smoke their chibouques, and regale themselves with sherbet. The trunk of the tree, at three feet from the ground, is thirty-four feet in circumference.

From Trupæ we descended to the Londari road. It winds along the banks of the Euro-tas, which is hemmed in by mountains on either side. The oleander, arbutus, and mulberry tree, were growing in abundance, and in spring must render the scene very beautiful. There were, however, no habitations, and it was only at the termination of four hours' ride that we reached Paravadyes, where our breakfast afforded great amusement to the surrounding rustics. We looked for the numerous traces of antiquity said to be visible on this road, but saw none; and the only object possessing any claims to notice was a small hill, well adapted for an Acropolis, and supposed by Gell to have been the ancient Belemina. Here we left the plain, and ascended the hills forming the western boundary, between Laconia and Arcadia: for some miles they were arid and barren, until we reached a spring issuing from the hill side, and near it were the ruins of an ancient building. This was the fount of the Eurotas, though it appeared to me that many other mountain streams had a better claim to the honour of giving birth to that classic river.

We had been informed that Londari was only nine hours distant from Mistra; but after a fatiguing ride of twelve hours, we were still far from the town. A pyrgo, with its dependent village, on a distant hill, was the only shelter that offered itself to us, and we therefore resolved to continue our journey ; but our muleteers mutinied ; they declared that their animals could proceed no farther, night had set in, and we were obliged to stop at a small hamlet on the summit of the ridge separating Arcadia from Laconia.

There did not appear to be more than four huts in the village, and to these we sent Theodore as an ambassador ; but at all he was refused admittance. At last his reiterated knocks brought out a savage-looking wretch, with pistols in his belt, who flatly refused to give us a lodging. We said that we were Franks, and that we would pay him ; but he did not credit our assertions, and we had the unpleasant prospect before us of passing the night in the open air, exposed to the frost and to a bitter north wind. We fortunately had remarked near the village a small building, apparently ruinous and untenanted—this we proposed to occupy ; and although it was the village church, the man offered no objection. The roof was partly broken, earth and rock formed the floor, and the only symptoms that we observed of its being a church, were two paintings of St. Athanasius, to whom it was dedicated, and who, decked in blue and gold, and holding a

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

“ Here, Hellenes !” said Theodore, as he threw them the bones we had left ; and forthwith they seized and began to gnaw them with the greatest delight : they were quite wild. After turning them out, we barred the door, placed our pistols beside us, and did not fall asleep without some expectation of a fight before morning. Day however broke without any intervening occurrence, and we pursued our way. This was the only time that we met with inhospitality in Greece, and I therefore record the name of the village,—it was Spaneika.

A ride of two hours brought us to Londari, now a mere heap of ruins : there were only eight houses occupied, although once it had been a town of some importance : it is situated on a hill at the extremity of Mount Taygetus, and commands a magnificent view of the plain of Megalopolis, which is partly covered with woods of oak, and partly cultivated : the Alpheus winds through it, and a tall, black cypress, the only one in the plain, marks the site of Sinano, the ancient Megalopolis. Londari was defended formerly by a citadel, and the walls still remain, and appear to be the work of the Venetians : there is also a curious old Greek church, which the Pappas assured me was built by the Emperor Andronicus. We examined the interior, in hopes of finding an inscription, but only saw the name of a French traveller scribbled on one of the columns. The remains of a minaret showed that the church had once been sacred to Mahomet, whilst some antique remains betokened that a heathen God had likewise been adored in the same spot. The supremacy of different religions in turn, is often exemplified in Greece. Almost every Greek chapel was built on the ruins and with the materials of an ancient temple ;—then came the Mahomedans, who converted the churches into mosques ; and now the Revolution has again restored them to their original functions. An inscribed marble lying near the church appeared to have been the pedestal of a statue, but the only words I could distinguish were, Pont, and Cos. A school, on the principle of mutual instruction, adjoined the church, and the dirty little wretches who were playing about began chattering their lessons as loudly as possible, when they saw us approach, hoping to impress us with a high opinion of their learning.

Sinaño, where we breakfasted next day, is inhabited by an Albanian colony, and in a more prosperous state than most of the villages we had passed. Colocotroni's standard-bearer seemed to be the principal person in the village, and his house stood close to the ruined pyrgo of the Turkish Aga, to whose expulsion he had no doubt contributed.

His son accompanied us to the ruins of Megalopolis, which are a quarter of a mile beyond Sinano. The theatre, being the largest in Greece, is considered an object of curiosity; but after seeing that at Epidaurus, this had few claims upon our admiration. The other vestiges of temples are numerous. Megalopolis, though founded by Epaminondas, and the birth-place of Philopœmon, has but little historical fame: it was built for the purpose of counterbalancing the power of Sparta, and being unequal to the task, fell as rapidly as it had risen. All great cities derive their size and power either from their situation in the centre of a state, or from their local advantages being such as to avail them for the purposes of trade; but Megalopolis had none of these. The inhabitants were gathered from the various districts of Arcadia, and thrown together without possessing interests in common; and after its foundation, the Arcadians (who were always quarrelling amongst themselves) did not support Megalopolis, and thus it soon sunk into insignificance, and now is scarcely to be dis-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

roofed the houses, and we should have seen the interior of all. Far beneath the town there appeared a rent in the mountain, and at the bottom of this chasm flows the Alpheus, but it is only seen when it emerges from the glen lower down the valley.

The castle appears to be of Venetian origin, and was repaired by Colocotroni during the war: it contains tanks for water, granaries, and two ranges of barracks, as well as a house for the chief. A few guns are mounted on the ramparts; but its best defence would be from a good fire of musketry. Caritëna was the spot where first the Revolution blazed forth in the Morea; and when the Greeks armed themselves, the Turks fled to the castle, (then in ruins,) where they held out until the arrival of succours, when it became the turn of the Greeks to fly; the Turks burnt the town; but when Colocotroni advanced with his troops, they retreated to Tripolizza; and Colocotroni, being sensible of the advantages offered by the castle as a military post, repaired it as I have above stated, and held it during the remainder of the war. When Ibrahim made his first visit to Caritëna, the inhabitants abandoned the town to the flames of the Egyptians. As soon as he retired, they rebuilt their houses;—he came a second time, and again set fire to their dwellings; a third time they rebuilt them, and the persevering Ibrahim once more marched his devastating bands to the town. There are now about one hundred houses, containing six or seven hundred inhabitants, who appear to be less impoverished than most of the Moreots; our host, for instance, had a comfortable house with paper windows, and the walls of our apartment were decorated with two brace of pistols, three silver-mounted muskets, and two ataghans, captured from the Turks. All the men had served under Colocotroni, who is a native of Caritena; and in the plunder of the Turks they were amply recompensed for the destruction of their houses. There were several shops in the main street, but the most conspicuous were a blacksmith's and an armourer's, bespeaking the ruling pursuits of the inhabitants to be war; indeed, the armed retainers of Colocotroni, strolling about, gave quite a military appearance to the town.

Of all the people produced by the Revolution, no one has been more conspicuous than Colocotroni. His career was extraordinary, and, like many other events in Greece, reminds us of the feudal era, when personal strength and courage were qualities which often conferred power and nobility on the possessor, and transformed a bandit into a baronial chieftain.

George Colocotroni, the father of the present chief, was well known and much dreaded thirty years since, as the leader of a numerous band of robbers, or klepths, who infested the vicinity of Caritëna, and in the mountains around found a safe retreat from the pursuit of the Turkish cavalry. In those days, the profession of klepth was looked upon by the Greeks as one redounding to the credit of the oppressed nation ;—instead of viewing the robberies committed by the kelpths with alarm, they felt proud that a small body of independent men should laugh to scorn the power of the Porte, and within the heart of its dominions inflict daily injuries upon the wealth or persons of the Osmanlis :—they forgot the robber in the patriot ; they fancied that the hardy klepths kept alive a spark of liberty in their breasts, which, sooner or later, would kindle into a flame, and as the event proved, they were partly right in their conjectures.

There were many of these lawless fraternities scattered throughout Greece, where they continued to defy the power of the Turks, at times appearing in large bodies when a particular object was to be gained, and at others

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

alike his love of power and avaricious propensities. It is unnecessary for me to detail his proceedings during the war; suffice it to say, that his ambition has been completely gratified. His influence over the Moreots is uncontested; he has made Capo d'Istrias feel this, and obliged him to pay dearly for his friendship, or else find him a bitter and troublesome enemy; and he has filled his coffers with the plunder of Tripolizza and other parts of Greece. Thus has the robber transformed himself into the chieftain; and already, no doubt, does he look forward to the arrival of his sovereign, that he may be decorated with the insignia of chivalry, and transmit his name ennobled to his children.

Colocotroni was absent from his castle at this time, and we were consequently not so fortunate as a friend of mine, who, passing through Caritëna two years ago, was most hospitably received by the chief. The conversation they had will give a tolerable idea of the patriotism inherent in Colocotroni's character. Capo d'Istrias had just landed at Napoli, and Mr. R—— observed, that it was a fortunate circumstance for the Greeks, as they would now be able to live in quiet times are very bad indeed; formerly, if I wanted half a dozen sheep, I sent to the first flock I saw, and took them with or without leave: I never had to buy a horse; there were plenty in the country. I did just as I pleased, and nobody dared remonstrate; but now that this President is come, I cannot take a few sheep or fowls, but the rascally villagers go and make a complaint, and then I am written to by Government about them! Bad times, these!”

“ Ah !” said the old klepht, “ these new

Colocotroni has two sons: the eldest distinguished himself during the war, and obtained amongst the Greeks a high reputation for courage; the character of the second is quite the reverse; his education has been more civilized, and he is looked down upon as being effeminate.

The weather was now so fine, that we did not anticipate many obstacles in our visit to the Temple of Apollo at Bassæ, six hours distant from Caritëna, which we left on the 22nd, and descending to the Alpheus, crossed that river by a bridge of singular construction, from whence the view of the castle,* and of the

* In the sketch of this scene, a mistake was made, either by the engraver or myself. It is called Castle of Calavirta, instead of Caritena.—(See plate.)

Alpheus, is superb. We then ascended the mountain, and at every step enjoyed some variety in the scenery: our road was the same described by Dodwell, and we had some difficulty in persuading our muleteers to follow it, as they were bent upon proceeding to Andrizzena, and thereby gaining an extra day's pay.

A peasant armed with a musket, met us on the road, and after the usual salutation, called us aside with a great air of mystery, and first looking cautiously around to see that our muleteers were not observing him, he drew from his vest a small packet carefully tied up. This we hoped might contain some ancient coins; and we anxiously awaited until he had unfolded several coverings, and at last produced a little bit of shrivelled wood with two glass beads in it, so that it seemed like a monkey's face.—“Look!” said the man: we looked, but could not comprehend what he meant us to do.—“I gave,” said he, “one hundred dollars for this, to a doctor in Anatolico; and I would not part with it for any sum that you could offer.”—We again examined this valuable relic, but could not discover its virtues; and at last he told us, that whether it came from God or the devil he could not say, but that it was an infallible charm against wounds of every kind!

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Thirty-five columns are still erect, the pavement is perfect, the marble ceiling is scattered in fragments around, as if it had just fallen in, and there is no miserable habitation of the present day near enough to defile the spot; the temple is grand in its solitude. To its secluded and inaccessible situation we may attribute its preservation; and it might have been hoped that, after combating successfully against time, during 2200 years, its remains would have been respected in the present day—Not so: the man in whose hut we lodged at Skleru, boasted that he had thrown down two columns in order to extract the lead from their fastenings; but there was an excuse for this, as the lead so procured was cast into bullets, and expended in successfully defending the village against a party of Ibrahim's troops. The temple was dedicated to Apollo Epicurius, and constructed by the architect of the Parthenon: its discovery was accidental, the persons who first saw it having been led to the spot by a hare they were pursuing. The frieze of the temple had fallen, and was covered with rubbish; but this having been cleared away, the sculptures now to be seen in the British Museum, under the names of the Phigalean marbles, were discovered, and brought to England by Mr. Cockerell. The view from the temple embraces the sea, Modon, Arcadia, Messene, Mount Taygetus, and countless hills and valleys in the foreground; and our situation was so elevated, that the cold was piercing. The thermometer fell below freezing point, and a northerly wind was blowing, which made us feel it very sensibly, and induced us to hasten down towards Skleru. The cold was such, that I could not hold my pencil.

The inhabitants of Skleru are a robust set of beings, and well adapted to the wild spot they reside in, for they appeared to have no wishes beyond what their valley could gratify. Their household utensils were all of the plainest kind; the trunks of trees hollowed out, formed the receptacles for their winter's store of corn; the women made the clothing, and the valley supplied them with a sufficiency of food: they were free from the Morea fever and the excessive heats of summer, but they could not escape the greater plague—Ibrahim. The women also appeared to possess more influence over the men, and to be more independent than in any of the villages I had yet seen.

We procured a guide at Skleru, who agreed to take us to Sinano by a different road from that we came by. He kept his promise; and instead of moving through the valleys, we followed the ridge of the mountain, and passed some fine oak forests, where, however, we regretted to see that many venerable trees had been wantonly burnt. The shepherds are the greatest enemies of the old trees in the Arcadian forests. The annual fall of the leaf causes an accumulation of rich soil under the tree, which, if exposed to the sun, throws forth the best grass imaginable: the shepherds, in order to secure this, set fire without remorse to the trunks of the oldest trees in the forests, and thus, for a few hours' profit, destroy what it has taken ages to mature: formerly there were trees in the vicinity of villages, but these having become the scene of insult to the females from the Turks, the Greeks seized every opportunity of felling them. The destruction of timber is advancing so rapidly, that unless the Government interferes, the Peloponnese will ere long be bare. Pausanias speaks of ranges of mountains covered with forests, which are now without a single tree, and the soil that was held on the high lands by the woods has been washed into the plains, leaving the hilly ground barren and unprofitable. Greece possesses such treasures within herself, that, under proper management, she need not be dependent upon Venice for her timber; some of her

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the stream, and we had no difficulty in fording it, preceded by a guide mounted on stilts. Eight or ten women and girls were standing on the bank, preparing to cross over to the village of Bromasera, with the bundles of wood they had been cutting in the mountains; and without in the least heeding our presence, they tucked up their garments, and like as many Naiads, plunged into the stream.

We slept at Sinano; and having promised our muleteers three days' pay if they would take us to Argos in two, we next morning crossed the plains of Tripolizza, and stopped for the night at the khan of Ayiruithica, at the foot of the pass leading to the Lake of Lerna.

A khan is the humble representative of an inn; and, previous to the war, khans were to be found on every road; some were erected by rich Turks, who entertained travellers gratis, whilst others were built upon speculation. This one where we halted had lately been re-established, and consisted of a stable for the cattle, and a long room with an earthen floor: one end was filled with provender, and at the other was the bar, where aquadente, wines, and provisions, might be purchased.

We congratulated ourselves upon obtaining such a refuge from the bitter cold, and having

S. Freeman sc.

TEMPLE OF APOLLO AT BASSÆ.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

screaming and swearing at the full extent of their voices about one para, the fortieth part of threepence halfpenny. By degrees the tumult subsided, each party pursued its way, and we resumed our journey.

The morning was so cold, that we wrapped ourselves in great coats, shawls, &c., as if we had been in England; but we could not keep ourselves warm; the water which had spread over the road was frozen, and the pools were full of ice. A good fire at a khan where we breakfasted had the effect of thawing us; and whilst we were there, the three Greeks whom we had seen the preceding evening likewise came in and breakfasted, but the little girl was not with them; and when we were going away, we observed that they had left the poor child sitting outside near the ice, exposed to the piercing north wind, and looking so cold and unhappy, that we felt quite indignant at the conduct of her protectors, who, however, took no notice of her misery.

The road from hence was good; we entered Argos at an early hour, and were delighted to find ourselves once more within the sphere of civilized life; and the comforts of a well-regulated English establishment made us doubly feel how much inconvenience our love of the classics had induced us to support. In truth, travelling in Greece, at this season of the year, can scarcely be called pleasant:—bad roads, bad horses, wet baggage, dirty hovels instead of houses; vermin, cold, and countless other plagues, are what a traveller must expect, who undertakes a winter's tour in the Morea. April, May, and June, are the proper months; and then travelling is delightful.

CHAPTER VIII.

Nomination of Prince Leopold to the Sovereignty.—Disappointment of Capo d'Istrias.—Opinions of the Greeks.—Discussions relative to the Frontiers.—Epidaurus.—Arrival of the Duchess of Plaisance at Ægina.—We proceed to Athens; anchor in the Piræus.—Karaskakai.—Enter Athens.—Bey's Palace.

SHORTLY after our return to Argos, the nomination of Prince Leopold to the sovereignty of Greece became publicly known, and this intelligence caused as much dismay to the partisans of the President's family, as it did pleasure to the liberal minded and intelligent portion of the inhabitants,—the Roumeliots, the Islanders, and the constitutional party, formed the latter; whilst the ignorant Moreots, who were entirely at the beck of Colocotroni, composed the former party, backed by the council miscalled Senate, which, as I before observed, contained a body of illiterate men quite devoted to the will of Capo d'Istrias:—his words were their words, his wishes their wishes; and in parodying the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

mere slave of Russia,) maintain Greece on a footing with the Allied Powers, which would evince her deep feelings of gratitude for their exertions in her favour, and not militate against her independence.

When the nomination of Prince Leopold was first publicly talked of, the President affected to treat the report with contempt; but when the fact became subsequently known, he expressed himself delighted with the decree of the Allied Powers, and said, "that from the commencement of his government, he had been constantly impressing upon them the necessity of placing a foreign prince on the throne of Greece; that, for his part, he had long been tired of public life, and wished to pass the remainder of his days in retirement; but if his dear country required that he should still devote his talents to her cause, he would willingly serve under Leopold as minister, or in any other capacity."

To those who were acquainted with Capo d'Istrias's character, these professions seemed of dubious import; in the exaggerated and malicious reports subsequently circulated amongst the people, it was easy to perceive that some deep counterplot was in agitation; and so well were his subordinate engines worked, that he succeeded in maturing his projects, and (as the result proved) threw imaginary difficulties in the way of the sovereign, which caused his resignation, and delivered Capo d'Istrias from the fear of English influence. Capo d'Istrias well knew that if a British Prince ascended the throne of Greece, his power would terminate; he had long since given up all hopes of imposing upon the clear-sightedness of the British Government, who had pierced through the flimsy veil he cast over his designing policy; he knew that the false patriot appeared to them in his true colours, and by an underhand intrigue could he alone hope to counteract the fate which he foresaw awaited him. The senate was called; he pulled the strings of his puppets; and whilst he uttered the words, the obedient machines performed whatever the showman required.

I was speaking one day to an extremely clever Greek gentleman relative to the change likely to ensue in Greece on the arrival of Prince Leopold, who, he hoped, would hasten his departure from England; and by a strange though just comparison — “The first seven years of the Revolution,” said he, “may not unaptly be termed our hell; the last two, our purgatory; and we now, in the accession of Prince Leopold to the throne, hope to realize our paradise. Those who have really the welfare of Greece at heart, view the nomination of the Prince as the measure, of all others, that they could most have desired. Greece, in his appointment, sees that not only the wishes of the Allied Powers, but also her own feelings, have been consulted; and that, far from having a sovereign imposed upon her, she has, in fact, been a party in his selection; for, in 1825, when first she sought the protection of Great Britain, she requested that Prince Leopold might be sent to preside over her interests. — Under his government, in five years we may hope to see Greece a flourishing country: the wounds caused by the Revolution are already partially healed; and although the spirit which should animate and fully awaken the energies of Greece is still dormant, it is not from there being a deficiency of materials to work upon, but because there has been no controlling power to call it forth and direct its first impulse. That being once given, and life infused into the weakened frame of this country, its prosperity will increase most rapidly. The recent events in Greece may be compared to those fires which, in consuming the withered herbage of the mountains for a time, cause the land to seem bleak and desolate; but after the first beneficent shower, the verdant grass springs up, the shrubs sprout forth anew,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ill in not giving them Constantinople. The exact boundary was not generally known when I left Greece; but it has since become a matter of discussion, as being coupled with the resignation of Prince Leopold. Let us see what claims the Greeks have to the territory which has been so artfully demanded for them by Capo d'Istrias.

To whom does Greece owe her independence? Not to herself; since, but for the interference of the Allied Powers, there would not have been at this day a single Greek alive in the Morea. In 1827, Ibrahim Pasha was in full possession of the whole country, excepting Napoli di Romania and the small district of Epidauria: he had an unbounded command of men, money, and ships: he was flushed with victory, and fixed in his determination to slay or capture every Christian he could meet:—and what had the Greek Government to oppose to this power? A pennyless treasury; a navy without equipments; a dispersed army; and divided councils! In Eastern and Western Greece, their position was not more flourishing. The Vizier Kutayieh, after defeating their army, was in quiet occupation of Attica, the greatest part of Bœotia, and Eubœa. The fortresses in Western Greece were occupied by Turkish garrisons; and the Greek forces were nominal.

In the islands, the Greeks had been rather more successful : they still held Samos ; but in Candia, the great object of their ambition, the Turks had the upper hand.

Greece was at the last gasp, when the Allies stepped in betwixt her and destruction. The French army landed :—Ibrahim was forced to forego his advantages ; and the Morea, being under the protection of Maison's force, Church was enabled to clear Western Greece from the enemy ; so that, when hostilities ceased, the relative possessions of the contending powers were as follows :—

GREECE.	TURKEY.
The Morea.	Attica.
Acarmania.	Bœotia.
Ætolia.	Eubœa.
Samos.	Candia.
The Cyclades.

This position of the two states rendered it difficult for the Allied Powers to decide as to the future boundary of Greece, without infringing upon territory belonging to either party. With what appearance of justice, then, could they possibly say to the Porte—You must cede to us Attica, Bœotia, and Eubœa, as they are required for the new state ; but we will not offer you an equivalent : and what would Greece be without Athens, and how useless Attica, unless its right flank were rendered secure by the cession of Bœotia and Eubœa? The Greeks themselves had undoubtedly no claim to a voice in the debate ; they owed every thing to the Allies : without their interference, they would still have been slaves, and the victims of a tyrannical persecution ; but this interference was not set forth for the purpose of gratifying the pride of the most vain-glorious people upon earth ; it was not with a view to heap additional insult on the head of our ally the Sultan, nor to form a kingdom with his provinces, because they bore names endeared to us by classical recollections. The mere wish to pacify Europe, and the dictates of humanity, induced us to side with the Greeks as a suffering Christian nation, and obtain for them a resting-place. We first used arguments in their favour, but were unsuccessful ; we then appealed to arms, and shed our blood in their cause when they deemed it hopeless ; and surely the Greeks had no right to interfere in the arrangement of the territory they could not defend, and which was won for them by the Allies. In the line of demarcation pointed out by the Protocols lately published, the Allied Powers have acted with a due regard to the interests of Greece and Turkey. The latter cedes

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the Acarnanians (who are undoubtedly the best of the Greeks) to leave their native province, is one of minor importance. The finest lands in Greece are now at the disposal of the Government, and will prove an ample remuneration for the barren soil of the country they leave behind them ; and, as they have their houses yet to build, it is immaterial whether they construct them in Acarnania or in Ætolia.

If it be asked, why the Allied Powers changed the line of frontier originally allotted to Greece, the answer is easily found, by their having released the Greek states from all allegiance to the Porte, as was contemplated when first Arta and Volo were pointed out as the limits of the two countries ; and the most ardent friends of Greece cannot possibly object to the cession of a barren district like Acarnania, in lieu of an odious tribute, which, whilst it wounded the national pride of the Greeks, left an opening for the future intervention of the Porte in their affairs. From what I heard in Greece, I am convinced that the enlightened class in that country is perfectly satisfied with the arrangements of the protecting Powers ; and, although the Acarnanians may grumble, and Capo d'Istrias still wage a paper war against Europe, there is not much reason to suppose that their arguments will effect any alteration in the plan now settled upon.

* * * * *

At the end of January I left Argos for Epidaurus, on my way to Ægina, where I expected to meet Captain Gordon, who had sailed for Paros, purposing to visit Athens on his return.

The ancient town of Epidaurus stood on a point of land projecting into the sea, and forming on either side a sheltered bay, admirably adapted for the vessels of the ancients; but few ruins are now visible. On the road-side is a headless statue of a male figure, in a recumbent posture; and on the summit of the hill, a number of sepulchral chambers are to be seen cut in the rock. It appeared to me that many of these had not been opened; and there is every probability that their contents would repay for the trouble of excavating them.

Pidavro, the modern village, contains about thirty houses, and a wine shop, which acts as an inn for those who are delayed here by contrary winds. This was my case. I was obliged to remain a whole day in this den, in company with some Greeks from Salona, one of whom assured me, that in excavating near Delphi many inscribed marbles and other curiosities had been discovered in a cavern, which may perhaps be the celebrated cave where the oracle was delivered. However, upon such authority as this, it is impossible to form an opinion; and although I subsequently wished to verify his report, by sailing from Corinth to Salona, the weather was so bad that I could not fulfil my intention. When Athens is the capital of Greece, Pidavro, being the point of communication between it and Argolis, will become a place of some importance.

I reached Ægina in time to witness the departure of the Russian fleet for the Baltic. During my absence, the Duchess de Plaisance and her daughter selected Ægina as their place of residence. These ladies, who are extremely well versed in classic lore, came to Greece with the determination of spending the remainder of their lives amidst the ruins of Athens; and as they are possessed of a large fortune, Greece may feel much obliged to Themistocles and Leonidas, for having inspired them with the Philhellenic mania. It is to be feared, however, that disgust may induce Madame de Plaisance to leave Greece sooner than she at first intended; for she has been terribly undeceived in her classic dreams. She expected to find "Hotels Garnis" in Greece; and she has been obliged to occupy a most wretched mansion! Should she remain, it will be in her power to do

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

narrow entrance of the Piræus, having the tomb of Themistocles on one side, and the remains of the trophy erected by the Athenians, after the battle of Salamis, on the other; and anchored opposite to a ruined convent, which had been warmly contested by the Greeks and Turks in 1827. The Albanians, who defended it, at last capitulated to the Greeks, with the proviso that they should be permitted to rejoin the Turkish army; but when they were marching out, the accidental discharge of a pistol was construed by the Greeks into an act of hostility; and, notwithstanding the entreaties of their officers, they attacked the prisoners, and began to massacre them. The Turks, in the hopes of saving the Albanians, opened their batteries upon the mass of combatants, and killed many, both friends and foes; but, nevertheless, the Albanians were exterminated. The battle of Athens took place soon afterwards; and the Greeks being defeated, the Acropolis surrendered to the Turks, and is now the only fortified post they possess in Greece. A small body of irregular troops, under the command of a Bey, forms the garrison, and the chief is very civil to strangers; but, unfortunately, will not allow any one to enter the Acropolis, from the foolish idea that they wish to spy the nakedness of the land:

we, however, hoped that Mr. Gropius, being an old acquaintance, would induce him to relent.

We lost no time in landing, and bent our steps towards the town. On our right, at the termination of the high land forming the Piræus, the spot was pointed out to us where Karaskakai, one of the best of the Greek generals, received his death-wound.—Karaskakai was a Thessalian by birth, and klepht by profession; and his mother, who was attached to a band of Klephts, had nurtured him in the manner which best became one whose future life promised to be of a stormy nature. His early habits inured him to fatigue, and accustomed him to war; and no stigma was attached to his profession by the Greeks. The klephts, as I have before observed, were considered in the light of independent soldiers; and as the Turks were the chief sufferers by their predatory attacks, the Greeks viewed them with feelings of regard, and identified their cause with that of the nation. Undaunted courage, considerable talent, and unbounded generosity, were qualities which soon raised Karaskakai above his comrades; and his own ambition prompted him on every occasion to take the lead. Prodigal alike of his money and his person, sharing the fatigues of his men, and participating in their privations, he succeeded in obtaining an unbounded control over the soldiery, who viewed him as their idol ; and his early experience of the Turkish and Greek mode of fighting, rendered him capable of employing his men to the best advantage. He was, therefore, eminently suited to the times in which he lived ; and those qualities which would have rendered him a dangerous and troublesome man under a settled government, were of use during the stormy period of the Revolution.

Karaskakai's death was deplored as a national misfortune, especially as his life was thrown away in an insignificant skirmish, at a time when his talents were most required. At the commencement of 1827, he had taken post in the vicinity of Athens, where he watched the Turks who, under Kutayieh, were besieging Fabvier in the citadel ; and when Lord Cochrane and General Church resolved upon giving battle, he united his forces to theirs, and stationed himself near the hill I have alluded to. Three days previous to the battle of Athens, some Palicari who had been drinking too freely, proposed to rush forward and attack a small Turkish entrenchment in their front ; and, without officers or system, they ran up to the Tambour ; but the Turks resolutely held their ground, until supported

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ling walls and tenantless houses ; and the voices of our party were the only sounds that broke in upon the stillness of the night—we then came to a part of the town which had been converted into a bazaar, and found ourselves amidst a number of dirty Albanians and Turks, who were lounging about near the only mosque still left to the followers of Mahomet in the “land of the free.”

The Bey's palace was not far distant, and had formerly been occupied by Mr. Gropius, who must have felt a little annoyed at being a suppliant for hospitality at the gate of his own mansion. It was an extensive building, and gave us a good idea of what modern Athens contained when she existed. There was a square court inside, and in the middle of it from a fountain spouted a plentiful stream of water. A large open gallery, communicating with all the rooms in the house, looked over this ; and the apartments, though now dirty and dilapidated, had been adorned with gilding and painting.

The Bey was absent on a hunting-party ; but his secretary, an old Turk with orthodox beard, and (according to Mahmoud) heterodox turban, ushered us into the presence-chamber, gave us pipes and coffee, and, whilst supper was preparing, occasionally offered us rum and water. At eight o'clock supper was announced, and an attendant presented us with a towel, and poured water over our hands ; and then a round copper table or tray, two feet high, was placed before us. Some pieces of bread were thrown on this, a wooden spoon was given to each person, and a long napkin spread over our knees, and then we were regaled with soup, and six other dishes in succession, from which we helped ourselves with our fingers.* A cup-bearer stood behind, and poured out wine for us ; and an Albanian soldier in his martial costume held the lamp in one hand, whilst the other rested on his pistols. Around were crowded a number of Turks and Albanians, who stood motionless, with their hands grasping their ataghans and pistols, as if but awaiting the nod of the chief to use them. It was a truly Eastern scene, and more characteristic than any thing that I saw at Constantinople. Notwithstanding the strangeness of the dishes, and the disagreeable operation of eating with our fingers, we did ample justice to the Bey's hospitality ; and after being again dosed with coffee and tobacco, spread our blankets on the divan and slept.

* I once asked an Albanian woman why she did not use a fork in eating. She held up her hands in answer, and said, You have only one fork ; I have ten !

CHAPTER IX.

Ruins of Athens.—Monument of Lysicrates.—Temple of Jupiter Olympius.—Fount of Callirhœe.—Temple of Theseus.—The Pnyx.—The Parthenon.—The Erechtheion.—Bey of Athens.—Ypsali and Padishah.—The Maid of Athens.—Value of Land.—Sieges of Athens.—Operations of Sir Richard Church.—We sail for Salamis.

ATHENS has been so fully described, that in mentioning its antiquities, I do not pretend to cast any new light upon the subject, but merely to point out what has been injured, and what has escaped during the war of the Revolution. Mr. Gropius led us in succession to every thing that was remarkable; and we could not have had a more excellent cicerone. The destruction of the town has also exposed to view all the ancient buildings, which still tower in conscious superiority above the modern ruins that lie around them. We first proceeded to the wall and seven Corinthian columns forming one side of the Pantheon of Adrian, and since answering as a support to the Vaivode's palace; and from thence to the octagonal building known as

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

places where it threatened to fall, but his care has been rendered almost nugatory by the depredations of the Turks, or of soi-disant amateurs, who, since last May, have not only mutilated several figures of the beautiful bas-relief, but also wantonly thrown down one of the Corinthian capitals, and deprived that side of the building of its necessary support. The mania for destruction which actuates all those who visit Athens is incredible. Every youngster who obtains leave to have a cruise on shore, thinks it necessary to carry off a piece of marble as a relic: if the head or leg of a statue, so much the better. A stone is seized and applied as a hammer to one of the finest bas-reliefs; off flies a fragment, and on board starts the midshipman with his prize. Some years since, a letter was picked up at Athens, written by one of the midshipmen of a man-of-war stationed at the Piræus, to his messmate who was at Athens, requesting him to knock off another piece from the Caryatides, as he had lost the marble he took with him! .

After deploring the damage inflicted by the ignorant in this direction, we bent our steps towards the banks of the Ilissus; where sixteen Corinthian columns of the magnificent temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius are to be seen. The enormous size of these,* their beautiful proportion and exquisite workmanship, strike the beholder with astonishment; the chaste severity of the Doric temples pleases the eye, but these ruins surprise it; and if so few columns have such an imposing effect, what must it not have been when one hundred and twenty were standing! Upon the summit of two of the columns, a fanatic, who wished to emulate the fame of Simeon Stylites, constructed a hermitage, where he passed his life, depending upon the charity of the righteous or superstitious for support; but the tenant is long since dead, and the ill-cemented mass of stone forming his airy habitation, threatens at every gust of wind to fall from the place it has usurped, and mingle with its kindred rubbish. On following the banks of the Ilissus, here a mere rill, we came to the ruins of a bridge leading across it to the Stadium, in shape a parallelogram, between two high embankments, where in former days the multitude assembled to see the prize of swiftness of foot contended for: on one side was the Temple of Victory, where the successful candidates were crowned; and by a strange coincidence, its ruins were converted into an entrenchment, either by Turks or Greeks, during the last war: the Goddess, however, enraged at her worship having been so long neglected by the Greeks, lent her aid to their adversaries.

* Sixty-eight feet high.

The fount of Callirhöe, whither the Athenian maidens used to resort for water, next attracted our attention—two dirty half-clad Albanian women washing their rags in the stream, were but poor substitutes for the contemporaries of Lais and Aspasia. All indeed that we see in Greece is directly in opposition to classical romance. Trajan's gate is still uninjured, but is no longer used as an entrance to the town, whither we returned through a wretched Turkish gate, having as lintel a large piece of inscribed marble taken from the ruins of a temple constructed by one of the Roman Emperors. Spon gives the inscription, one half of which he found here, and the other at Venice. On our return to the Bey's palace, we examined an old Greek church, almost entirely built of sculptured stones; another was pointed out to us as having been once a Lutheran church, then a Catholic chapel, next a Greek church, latterly a school on the Lancasterian system, under the direction of the Philomuse Society,* and now a stable or pigsty. Athens

* The Society of the “ΦΙΛΟΜΟΥΣΟΙ” (Friends of the Muses) was instituted at Athens previous to the Revolution, and intended for the purposes of disseminating knowledge in the Romaic language, furthering education, and restoring the fine arts. The annual subscription was three or four dollars, and all travellers were invited to become members.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the pediment. The Turks discovered the spot; they climbed to the roof; and finding that the honey could not be extracted without overthrowing a portion of the building, they with considerable difficulty hurled down one-half of the pediment, which now, instead of its chaste outline, presents a broken and rugged breach. Some of the figures in basso-relievo have also been lately mutilated: here, one of the Lapithæ has had a leg knocked off; there, a Centaur has been beheaded; but these injuries are the works of virtuosi. The western end of the temple was severely injured by a flash of lightning, in 1821, which threw down a part of the cornice, and shattered one of the columns; but, notwithstanding this, the Theseion is still the most perfect temple in existence. The interior had been a Greek church, and is now a stable for the Turkish cavalry; under the dung we saw some inscriptions marking the site where an Englishman named Watson was interred.

We next walked to the Areopagus, and then to the Pnyx,* where the assemblies of the people used to be held. The stand of the orators, and the seats of the magistrates, being cut out of the solid rock, there is no doubt as to the identity of the scene ; and although not inclined, like Chateaubriand, to rhapsodize about every old stone that I chanced to see, I could not but feel a little enthusiasm when recollecting that I stood upon the exact spot where Themistocles and Aristides had so often agitated the multitude by their debates ; where Alcibiades had misled them by the brilliancy of his oratory ; where Pericles had first taught them to feel a distaste for the simplicity and poverty of their ancestors ; and where Demosthenes had thundered forth his philippics : but of those who spoke, and those who listened, not even the modern representatives were to be seen ;

* The Pnyx was excavated by the orders of Lord Aberdeen, when he travelled in Greece, about twenty years ago: but for him, it would have been undiscovered.

————— “ another race, Another generation fills their place !”

The remnants of entrenchments, a broken gun, and the voices of Turkish soldiers warning us not to approach their post on the hill of the museum, recalled to our memory that Asiatic barbarians were still the lords of Athens. Once more I hope that the Pnyx may be trod by the representatives of Greece, and that the sovereign will there make his first speech to his people.

In this vicinity some curious sepulchral chambers are hewn in the rock, and one of them has received the name of the tomb of Cimon ;

whilst another, with still less probability, is called the prison of Socrates. From the Pnyx we had an excellent view of the Parthenon, and saw with regret that the columns and pediment had been dreadfully shattered by the cannon from hence, and from the batteries at the monument of Philopappus. What, in fact, was supposed to be the safeguard of the Parthenon has caused its ruin; the strength of the Acropolis, as a military post, having exposed it to a siege on every occasion that war raged in the country around.

The first and severest injury it suffered was inflicted by the Venetians of Morosini's army, in 1697, a shell from their batteries having fallen upon the powder magazine formed by the Turks within the temple, and caused an explosion which overthrew many of the columns on both sides. From that period, until Lord Elgin commenced his depredations, it sustained little injury; but in extracting the Metopes, his Lordship's agents, to save themselves trouble and expense, destroyed a great portion of the frieze unnecessarily; and during the last siege, the cannon of the Turks has contributed to the work of demolition, and also shattered the left wing of the Propylæa. The Erechtheion has not escaped unhurt. A Turk of rank, who fled from the town at the time of the first insurrection, placed his wife

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

tablet which had hitherto been immured in a house, but now stands alone, and is inscribed with numerous regulations of Hadrian's, relative to the sale of oil. Not far from this is a handsome marble sarcophagus; and at the door of a Greek church are two marble chairs, ornamented in basso-relievo, and so made as to form a semicircle when placed together.

The fall of a house has lately disclosed a magnificent Torso of a Persian or Caryatides. The figure is that of a man nine feet high; his legs terminate with a fish's tail, turning up the back, and resting on the shoulders ; the head and arms are broken off, but the rest of the figure is perfect ; and half-buried in the earth near it is a similar statue, having only the head and shoulders at present visible. An excavation here would probably bring some curious pieces of sculpture to light ; but the trouble will be considerable, the earth having accumulated over ancient Athens to the depth of twelve feet, and in many places nearly thirty. The houses being built with earth instead of mortar, every ruin continues to increase the accumulation of the soil ; and the last demolition of Athens raised it more than a foot.

Whilst we were walking round the town, discussing with Mr. Gropius where the new city ought to commence, and building numerous castles in the air, we observed a body of cavalry advancing at a gallop on the plain :—this was the Bey and his escort ; and when we returned to the house, he was already installed on his divan.

There was nothing in the appearance of the Bey to point out his superiority in rank : his dress indeed was shabby ; and, instead of conforming to Mahmoud's costume, he wore the proscribed turban and pelisse. His eyes were still red from the excesses of the preceding night, for, like many other Osmanlis, he deemed it no sin to swallow the contents of a few bottles of rum ; and this pernicious habit had stamped his features with the marks of dissipation. He, however, received us courteously, and spoke two or three words of lingua Franca, acquired, as he said, during a voyage to Leghorn, which, in his opinion, was at the other end of the world ; but his travels had not added to the dignity of his demeanour ; and I soon perceived that he was far inferior in manners to the members of the court circle I had seen at Constantinople. His rank, in point of fact, was not very exalted, as his real office was that of selictar, or sword-bearer, to his cousin the Pasha of Negropont, whose authority extended over Attica and the other portions of Eastern Greece still held by the Turks. His page, a handsome young Cretan, with the features of an Antinous, stood beside him, dressed most gorgeously in the Albanian garb ; and the other end of the apartment was filled with his armed retainers, a worthless crew, composed of indolent wretches, who, for food and lodging, are content to swell the train of a great man, and add to his apparent importance.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Greece again. We asked for peace now ; not because we were afraid of the Muscovites, but that we were weary of the long continuance of a war which had separated us from our families, and made us even as strangers to our children. You do not think that we were deficient in soldiers? The Sultan had only to issue a firman, and he could raise as many thousands, or tens of thousands, as he pleased : they would come from every part of the empire, from one thousand, two thousand, three thousand miles distant !”

Rum and water was now offered to us by the page, and the Bey took repeated draughts, gradually forgetting to mix it with water, until at last it was almost pure spirit. We were quite surprised that he should be so well supplied with this beverage ; but the source of his wealth became accidentally disclosed to us. Mr. Gropius proposed that we should visit a small kiosk at the top of the house, whence there was an excellent view ; and when the secretary conducted us thither, we discovered that it had been converted into a spirit store ; shelves full of lemons were ranged round the room ; several loaves of English sugar were piled up in one corner, and some dozens of bottles labelled with the word "Rhum," in large letters, were on the floor. It is fortunate for the Turks that Mahomet was ignorant of the various uses of the sugar-cane; but as the Prophet had never heard of rum, and that his guardian angel did not reveal its future appearance to him, that spirit was not excluded from the beverage of the true believers, who, availing themselves of the omission, drink rum to excess. Captain Gordon increased the Bey's stock by a present which we knew would be most acceptable to him. A supper, similar to that of the preceding evening, closed our evening's entertainment; and the Bey, whose eyes were beginning to glisten, having stretched his mattress on the floor, and retired to rest, we followed his example. Before daybreak next morning, the Bey commenced smoking his pipe; and shortly afterwards, the officers under his command came to attend his levee—each making a humble salām, and then squatting in a circle on the floor, or at the extremity of the divan where we were sitting, coffee and pipes being the succedaneum for conversation. A Greek also came into the apartment, and read a letter he had received from the chief of a village, in Bœotia, seven hours distant, acquainting the Bey that four Delhis had been attacked by a Greek banditti in the mountains, and three of them murdered. This intelligence, though listened to with great calmness, did not please him much; he declared that Vasso and the other Greek chieftains at Salamis connived at these attacks, and participated in the spoil; and it is very probable that he was right in his conjectures. Men were forthwith dispatched to bring the heads of the delinquents, but their errand seemed likely to prove fruitless.

We had hitherto deferred asking the Bey's permission to enter the Acropolis, in the hopes that, as we became better acquainted, he might be induced to grant it; but we could no longer delay; and Mr. Gropius, in a whisper, made the important communication, begging the chief not to decide in a hurry, but to deliberate well on the subject. This he certainly did: for more than an hour he kept us seated on the divan doing nothing; and at last, when we hoped that our patience would be rewarded, he denied our request. "It was," he said, "beyond his power; for that he was surrounded by a set of scoundrels, who would avail themselves of the slightest opening to misrepresent his conduct, and effect his ruin. Were he to grant the desired permission, it would be said that Cap-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

walls at Ypsali we were shown the house occupied by the Maid of Athens, in her bright days, when her beauty was such as to call from Byron the praises contained in those lines commencing—

“ Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh give me back my heart !”

But twenty years have made some change in her appearance: she has exchanged her youthful appellation to that of Mrs. Black; and when I was at Ægina, had just presented her husband with a son. When her father's house was destroyed at Athens, she fled with her sister to Corfu, and I believe excited much interest there; a considerable subscription having been collected to enable her to return to Greece.

To the westward of Padishah, near two mounds of earth called Kolonos, is the spot formerly appropriated to the Grove of the Academy: it is now planted with olive trees; a small chapel on one of the hillocks occupies the site of a temple dedicated to Neptune, and another is supposed to stand on the ruins of Plato's house.

* * * *

As Athens must undoubtedly become the capital of Greece, not only in consequence of her classic fame, but also because her central position and excellent harbours eminently qualify her for that post; it is to be hoped that, in re-establishing the town, due attention may be paid to unite beauty and cleanliness. The ruins of the town at present form such a mass of rubbish, that it seems a fruitless task to attempt rebuilding on the same site, especially as the ground to the westward of the walls presents a more desirable position, open both to the land and sea-breeze, and commanding a fine view of the Piræus and surrounding country. The late town stood at the foot of the Acropolis; the object of the inhabitants being to seek protection under its walls; and thus the houses were crowded one upon another, in a manner prejudicial not only to the comfort but to the health of the inhabitants. This may easily be remedied; and the miserable wall built round the town by the Turks fifty years ago, can be levelled without difficulty. The ancient ruins should have a clear space left around them: a large square, or market-place, ought to be formed on the site of the ancient Agora, with wide streets leading from it to the outlets of the town; and then the Athenians, who chose, might build their habitations amongst the ruins; but the strangers attracted by commerce or fancy, the members of the Government, and the Prince himself, ought to fix their dwellings to the west of the present walls. Athens would then be one of the best situated cities in the world.

Men of capital wishing to settle in Greece, might find in the plains around Athens many inducements to build. Ground uncultivated, but capable of being planted with vines, may be purchased at fifteen piastres a strema ;* but this cannot be irrigated, and would not be productive before five or six years. Garden ground at Padishah is worth about seven hundred piastres the strema, and the proprietor is entitled to nine hours of water weekly. The water is private, or Government property, being brought in a channel from the Cephissus, and then distributed through the lands of those who choose to pay for it; but, although not abundant now, if proper measures are pursued, water enough may easily be conducted to the city. Building is not expensive at present; and for one thousand eight hundred or two thousand piastres, a person may build a house quite good enough for the actual circumstances of the country; ample materials are to be found

* Ten thousand square feet.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

powder in it, set fire to a slow match, and then ran behind a hill, fully a mile distant, where they waited to see the Acropolis flying in the air. The explosion took place, four or five stones were moved, but the Acropolis was still there, and the Turks on the walls bade them defiance; they therefore concluded that the mine had not exploded, and that only the match had taken fire; and for a whole day they remained quiet, awaiting the grand result; they then ventured to look at the mine, and were undeceived. An attempt was next made to carry the Acropolis by storm; but this failed, with the loss of forty men; and it was only when they obtained possession of the well which supplied the citadel with water, that the Turks agreed to capitulate, on condition of being forthwith embarked and sent to Asia. The Acropolis then was delivered up, and the Turks, with their families, were quartered in the town; but, instead of fulfilling the capitulation, the Greek chieftains from day to day delayed embarking them, and this decision was fatal to the prisoners.

The Greek chiefs one day received intelligence that a large Turkish force was advancing upon Athens, and had already reached Thebes, and this news they instantly promulgated to the people, directing that each person should take care of himself. An indescribable scene of confusion was the natural result. The Greek women and children hurried out of the town, and rushed towards the Piræus, intending to embark for Salamis; whilst the Palicari, instead of manning the walls and preparing for a vigorous defence, ran in a body to the houses where the Turkish prisoners were confined, and commenced an indiscriminate massacre, in which the young and beautiful inmates of the harem, the aged and infirm, and the brave but defenceless spahis and janissaries, fell alike beneath the ataghan. Mr. Gropius, as Austrian Consul, had sheltered three hundred of these unhappy beings within the walls of the consulate,* and succeeded in saving their lives; but many hun-

* Mr. Gropius, on one occasion, threw away his hospitality upon some Turks, whose conduct deserves recording. At the time when the Ottoman troops were in possession of Athens, two Turks came to Gropius, and begged as an especial favour that he would allow them to leave a quantity of corn in one of the spare apartments of his house, where it would be safe from the rapacity of the Pasha. Leave was granted, and the corn deposited in the apartment, which was carefully locked up, and the key given to the owners. The Turks then took up their abode in a house adjoining; and conceiving that Mr. Gropius's residence would afford them rich plunder, they set to work, made a hole in the wall dividing the two houses, and penetrated into one of the dreds perished; and the Greek chieftains had great difficulty in restraining the soldiery, even after it was ascertained that the report which had given rise to these excesses was false. The third siege was laid by the Turks, in 1826. The Athenians, afraid of trusting to the miserable wall that encircled the town, once more fled to Salamis, but left a strong garrison in the Acropolis, with provisions for several months; and a spring of water having been discovered in the cave of Pan, and enclosed within the defences of the citadel by Odysseus, there was no danger of its being starved into a surrender. The Turks established batteries rooms. To their great disappointment, they found that it contained nothing but some old books and furniture; but their cupidity being excited by the facility of piercing through the wall, they resolved to make an opening into the lower apartment, and they were rewarded for their trouble by discovering a large store of wheat: this they forthwith carried off and sold; and then, fearful of their iniquity being discovered by Mr. Gropius, they hastened to his house, and begged that he would allow them to take away their corn. "Certainly," said Mr. Gropius, who immediately accompanied them to their granary, and had it opened in his presence; but to his surprise the corn was no longer there. The Turks also were stupified; but the case was soon elucidated. The rascals, without being aware of it, had been robbing themselves!

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies to follow the advice of the capitani, and adapt the plan of attack to the characters of the men composing the army, who, being always accustomed to fight behind their tambours and entrenchments, were not only incapable of effectually combating in the plain, but were actually afraid of the Turkish cavalry, whose prowess they had often experienced. General Church concurred in the latter plan, but he was overruled; and a night march through the plain was resolved upon. Daylight broke whilst the Greeks were still in motion: the ground was extremely favourable for cavalry movements, and three thousand Turkish horse advanced upon them at a gallop. The Greeks instantly broke from their ranks without offering resistance, and fled towards the sea-shore; about six hundred being cut down by the Turks. The Philhellenes, who attempted to defend themselves, were overpowered and annihilated, and the dispersion of the army was completed. Shortly after this disaster, Fabvier surrendered the Acropolis.

This unfortunate affair caused much blame to be unjustly heaped upon Church, whose services in the Greek cause have never been duly estimated; for in an army composed of such discordant materials as was that at Athens, a General-in-chief had little more than nominal authority; and he certainly ought not to be blamed for proceedings to which he was opposed. Although General Church was not so fortunate as to have a subsequent opportunity of effacing the recollection of this check by any brilliant affair, he effected with a very small force more than could have been possibly expected, and the Turkish garrisons in Western Greece successively capitulated to him, and left him in possession of that part of the country. Notwithstanding the repeated instances of breach of faith the Turks had experienced from the Greeks, they confided implicitly in the pledges of safety given by Church to their capitulating garrisons; and the conditions upon which they surrendered having been scrupulously fulfilled in every instance, the last incidents of the war ceased to be characterised by those dreadful atrocities that had hitherto darkened the glory of victory on both sides. Church possessed great influence over his men; and it was solely owing to this circumstance that he was able to keep up even the semblance of an army; for, instead of being supported by the Government, every possible difficulty was thrown in his way. His soldiers were neither paid nor provisioned, whilst those of other chieftains, who were unemployed, received both money and food; and at last, when he had no external foes to oppose in Acarnania, and that he saw how strong a feeling of enmity the head of the government bore towards him, he determined to resign his situation, until better times should dawn, and accordingly returned to the National Assembly of Argos the commission of generalissimo, which had been conferred upon him by the congress of Trœzen.

*

*

*

*

When we had seen all that Athens presented to our observation, we took leave of the Bey, and, according to the Eastern custom, distributed *baakshish to his attendants. The coffee-bearer, the pipe-bearer, the cook, the assistant-cook, the guards, the grooms, all came in for their share, this being the only pay they receive from their master, and an established arrangement. Mr. Gropius overheard the secretary taxing the cook with his dirty appearance; the other replied that he had no money. “No money!” retorted the secretary, “and what did you do with the baakshish given you by the Russian admiral?”

The Bey lent us horses, for which we paid the groom, and we galloped back to the Piræus, and reimbarked.

* Baakshish is the term used throughout the East, to signify a present. It is the same in India as in Turkey.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

mud as she sailed out ; but the eastern channel has sufficient water for a line-of-battle ship close to the shore, and the entrance is not so intricate as that of Poros, nor is malaria prevalent in the neighbourhood.

We were anxious to see the Palicari quartered at Salamis, and therefore landed on the island at Amphelaki, near the ruins of the ancient town, and, under the auspices of Mr. Gropius, proceeded to the house of Vasso, a Greek general,* who commanded one of the irregular bands during the war. It was a miserable cottage: the walls were hung round with arms of various kinds ; and at one end of the apartment sat a tall, handsome man, who was presented to us as the general, and a pretty little woman, his wife. Here we were obliged again to drink coffee, and eat sweetmeats, to our great disgust, —for during the whole day we scarcely had the coffee-cup out of our hands ; and, notwithstanding its supposed merits, were quite sick of the beverage : but there was no possibility of refusing the proffered cup. The lady, who

* The title of General, during the Greek war, was assumed by almost any one who chose. In Candia alone, there are six field-m Marshals, who may be seen driving their horses to market, making oil, pruning vines, &c. ; the generals in the same island are innumerable.

monopolized all the conversation, and had evidently the upper hand of the chieftain, possessed better manners than might have been expected from the consort of this bandit; but it appears that she acquired these when wife to a consul in one of the Greek islands. The consul had married her for the sake of the "beaux yeux de sa cassette;" and during the revolutionary war, Vasso and his gang being in the island, he invited him to his house, and treated him hospitably, in the hopes that the presence of such a redoubtable chief would secure his property from spoliation; but the poor consul, in avoiding Scylla, fell into Charybdis; for, one evening that the general, his wife, and himself, were seated at the supper table, the lady rose from her chair and left the room. Vasso remained drinking with his friend for a couple of hours; and wishing him good night, likewise retired. The consul then called his wife, but received no answer: he sought for her all over the house, but she was not to be found. He hastened to consult his friend Vasso, but he likewise had disappeared; and, to crown his misfortunes, he discovered that his wife had not forgotten to carry off her jewel-case. Much as he grieved for his spouse, still more deeply did this loss weigh upon his mind;

and when, after the divorce, Vasso claimed his wife's landed property, the poor consul could not resist this accumulated demand upon his happiness, but fell sick and died. Vasso, as the Bey of Athens observed, is strongly suspected of conniving at the robberies committed by the Greeks; at one moment threatening to punish the offenders, and at the next receiving his share of the spoil. He possesses no talent, and is so ignorant that he can scarcely read or write. Two letters were brought to him whilst we were there; but after looking at the superscription, he gave up the attempt to read it, and handed them to a person whom we supposed to be his Grammaticos,—that is to say, one who knows how to read and write, and is generally to be seen attendant on these ignorant chieftains.

An hour's walk across the island brought us to the opposite town of Colouri,* the headquarters of the irregular Greek forces under

* In speaking of Salamis, the Greeks make use of the modern name Colonri; but in dating a letter, they would call it Salamis. A wish exists throughout Greece, to restore the Hellenic names to the towns and provinces that are found in history; but the force of habit induces them still to use the corrupted denominations in conversation; although they studiously avoid doing so in writing. Thus the Morea is now divided into its ancient provinces.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

They also had this advantage over the Moreots, that whereas the latter were unacquainted with the use of arms, until roused from their passive subjection, the Roumeliots had at all times been acquiring a knowledge of the military profession, by their constant employment as Armatoli, in the passes of Northern Greece.

The Armatoli were formerly a kind of militia instituted during the Byzantine Empire, for the purpose of acting as a local police, and performing the military duty of such parts of Greece as were approached by mountain-passes likely to afford shelter to marauders, or impede the military communications of the empire.—The mountains connected with Mount Œta, and separating Greece from Thessaly and Epirus, especially called for the maintenance of a strict police; and the Ottomans, contrary to their usual system of disarming the rayahs, deemed it necessary to retain the Armatoli on the same footing as during the Byzantine Empire. The inhabitants of the country were made answerable for the safety of the passes, and obliged to maintain a body of Armatoli for that purpose; and as these soldiers were connected by the ties of birth and affection with the villages whence they were drawn, the Turks, instead of assuring their authority, were gradually undermining it, by forming, within the heart of Greece, a body of brave, indefatigable, and independent soldiers. So long as the Armatoli were called upon to repress the violence of Turkish freebooters, or to resist the pressure of an aga's extortion, they were useful to the Government that employed them; but when their services were required to exterminate a band of Klephtes, it more frequently happened that they made common cause with the robbers, and perhaps shared in their spoils. The slightest dispute with the Turkish authorities sufficed to drive them into open rebellion, and they too well knew their own strength and the fastnesses of the country, to doubt their power of obtaining the terms they pleased: their chieftains, or capitani, (a title which must have been assumed during the Venetian time,) possessed great authority, and were at the head of small or numerous bands, according to the reputation they acquired; and although at times, when in the pay of a Pasha, they were obedient to his commands, it more frequently happened that, uniting with the Klephtes, they led a life of freedom in the mountains, and supported themselves by levying "black mail" upon the inhabitants of the plains. In Northern Greece, the passes had all been placed under the control of one person ; and the celebrated Ali Pasha, as Dervendjee Bashee, having been appointed to this important post, the greater part of the Armatoli were placed at his command. With Ali, power was never nominal, and he soon succeeded in establishing his authority amongst these mountaineers, to whom at a future period he looked for succour in resisting the will of the Porte, should his misdeeds at last arouse the ire of the Sultan ; and although some districts of Northern Greece were never quite subservient to his authority, he may be said, in 1820, to have possessed the virtual control of all the Greek soldiery.

It was in this year that the Porte declared him a rebel ; and Ali's first step was to assemble his Armatoli, and urge them to assist him against the Porte ; whilst, on the other side, the Seraskier deputed by the Sultan to attack the Vizir, resorted to the dangerous expedient of calling upon the Greeks to take arms against Ali Pasha. Meanwhile the spirit of the Hetaria had been at work amongst the Greeks ; the seeds of liberty began to germinate ; and the Armatoli and Greek peasantry, instead of obeying the summons either of the Porte or its vassal, united their forces, and seized their arms in assertion of their

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

predominated ; and seldom, during the Greek war, was there an instance of their behaving well, except when allured by the prospect of plunder. They however deserve credit for the cheerful sacrifice they made of their homes, and for the hardships they endured, and saw their families suffer during the contest ; some allowance also must be made for their love of plunder, when it is recollected, that with the produce of their spoil alone could they save their families from starving,—for, during nearly eight years, the fields of Eastern and Western Greece were uncultivated, or, when ready to reap, seized upon by the Turks.

It is difficult to offer an opinion as to the courage of the Greeks. I conversed with many persons who served during the war, and were competent judges ; but from what they said, I should consider the gallantry of the Greeks much overrated. Individual instances of the most daring courage have been known ; but whenever the Greeks were brought to act en masse against the enemy, they did not distinguish themselves ; each man seemed more anxious to ascertain whether his comrade was going to run, than to display his own bravery. Their victories over the Turks were seldom gained in an open, hand-to-hand manner, the enemy having generally been conquered by famine, or overpowered by superiority of numbers; and the feeling of patriotism which we suppose incited the Palicar to battle, was not half so powerful a passion in his breast, as the desire of spoil. On many occasions, the Greeks evinced a mercenary spirit that did them no credit; and at all times their savage cruelty to the Osmanlis who fell into their hands was disgraceful to men who called themselves soldiers and Christians:—real courage does not prey upon the defenceless. As an excuse for this conduct, it has been stated with much plausibility, that they only retaliated for injuries received; but it was undoubtedly the Greeks who first threw away the scabbard, and told the Turks that the war was “al cuchillo.” The slaughter at Tripolizza may be extenuated, as the place was, in some measure, carried by storm; and every man must know how impossible it is to restrain a soldier in battle, when all the worst feelings of his disposition are let loose. But what can be urged in favour of those who, at Hydra, drew two hundred Turkish prisoners from the prison and deliberately slew them?—who at Athens murdered the prisoners taken in the Acropolis, after having attested heaven and earth to witness that their lives should be saved?—who at Corinth, in like manner, massacred the garrison after its capitulation, and who, in despite of the exhortations and prayers of their officers, put to death the brave Albanians, whose capitulation at the Piræus they had all assented to? Their individual acts of cruelty were countless: they never granted quarter: the Turks followed a similar system; and the war was one of individual extermination, instead of producing great results.

In thus pointing out the faults of the Greeks, I am far from wishing to exculpate the Turks; for what can be worse than the legal murder of the Patriarch of Constantinople, or the massacres of Scio and Ipsara?—or what more dreadful vengeance could have fallen upon the Greeks, than the visitation of Ibrahim Pasha? But I mean to observe, that the Greeks, who were claiming the rights of civilization, should have proved themselves deserving of the boon, by displaying a knowledge of its first dictate—humanity! and that, since they acted like thorough savages, they must thank themselves for being treated as such by the Egyptians.

The spirit of exaggeration inherent in the Greek character gave rise to such ridiculous reports during the war, that it was impossible ever to place confidence in the intelligence received from Greece. It was not uncommon to hear of a battle lasting nine hours, in which the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

covered with snow; they had no wood; and could only light a fire by burning their saddles. At the termination of eight days, being exhausted with hunger and cold, they resolved to cut their way through the Greeks, and accordingly sallied forth; but so perfectly were they unnerved by their suffering, that they could offer no resistance, and one thousand were killed the first day, and eight hundred the next, whilst the Greeks lost only four men! This was a mere massacre. An European force would have made the Turks prisoners.

One action fought by the Greeks does them infinite credit, and may without doubt be compared to the battle of Thermopylæ. I allude to the attack by Marco Botzaris, with three hundred Suliots, upon the army of Mustapha; an attack, fatal it is true, to the chief who led it, but which has conferred immortality on his name. The defence of Missolonghi is another fine feature of the war; and the destruction of the Turkish army in the defiles near Corinth, and the surrender of Dramali's force at Acrata, are also events redounding to the credit of the Greek generals; but the rest of their operations present a chaotic mass of marches, countermarches, and skirmishes, which it is almost impossible to understand.

The vagrant, independent life led by the Palicari of late years, has, I should say, unfitted them to become useful members of society; but the experiment ought most undoubtedly to be tried, for, in their present state, they are a heavy drain upon the resources of the country, and are perfectly useless as soldiers. The longer that they remain imbodyed, the more difficult will it be to disperse them; and it is not unlikely but that some of the old Klephtes may reform themselves into predatory bands, and carry on a border war highly detrimental to the interests of the nation; but as the Allied Powers purpose granting a military force to the Sovereign of Greece, there will be little trouble in exterminating them. Men who have been accustomed to rule by the sword, must in turn be governed by it; and a few severe examples of what a well organized and powerful government is capable of doing, would have a great effect upon these freebooters.

Turkish punishments, though severe and sanguinary, lost their effect, because they weighed equally upon the innocent and the guilty; but when the Greeks understand that crime can never escape from the vengeance of the laws, whilst innocence in them will find protection, they will cease to look upon the Klephtes in the same light as formerly, and assist the Government in putting them down. On the confines of Albania, the Palicari have already given a specimen of what may be expected from them hereafter, the troops appointed to defend the frontier having had a serious affray with the Albanians. It appears that the Greeks could not withstand the temptation offered by some flocks of sheep browsing within sight of their post, and, forgetting that a truce existed, they amused themselves by carrying off a great number of the sheep. The Albanians would not allow this outrage to pass unpunished, and, having assembled in considerable force, attacked the Greeks when they least expected them, and killed or wounded one-fourth of their number. There the matter ended: the Greeks having been the aggressors, could not complain, and the Albanians had revenged themselves sufficiently.

There were between four and five thousand men at Colouri; but as they were all quartered in the town, we had no opportunity of seeing them to advantage; not that they ever have drills or parades, their sole tactics being how best to hide themselves behind a rock or tambour; but that the scene would have been more characteristic, if they had been in bivouac. The

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

a large building, calculated to resist the attacks of a piratical band, and commanding a view of Eleusis and a great part of the Gulf of Salamis. Within the walls, there is a church decorated with a profusion of paintings, and around it was a bivouac of the Greek soldiery, who were stalking about wrapped up in their huge capotes. We here embarked, and having sailed through the narrow channel where the Persians blocked up the Greeks during the battle of Salamis, passed Megara, and in the evening anchored at Kenchræ, the eastern port of Corinth.

In the morning we landed, and proceeded towards Hexamilia. On our way we passed the ruins of the Temple of Neptune, and the Stadium, where the Isthmian games were celebrated. The remains of the temple are very extensive, but no columns are now erect: near them runs the wall dividing the Peloponnesus from Greece, which, after being repeatedly restored, and as often found useless, is now quite neglected. The real defences of the Isthmus are in fact to be found in the Geraunian mountains, stretching across from gulf to gulf, and having only three passes, which may be easily held against a superior force; but, notwithstanding this, the Greeks always allowed the Turks to penetrate as far as Corinth, before they offered any effectual resistance. Even in the lowest part of the Isthmus there are many excellent positions.

The canal commenced by Nero on the western side was to have terminated at Kenchræ; but this undertaking was soon abandoned, and that portion of it already commenced shows how tremendous the labour must have been, as it was necessary to cut through the solid rock almost the whole way. The ostensible motive for discontinuing the work was, that the engineers supposed the sea on one side of the Isthmus to be at a higher level than on the other, and that consequently, by its rushing in, the country would be overflowed.

At Hexamilia we were hospitably received by Dr. Howe, the gentleman who has charge of the colony formed there by the American Philhellenist Committee, and redounding much to the credit of our Trans-Atlantic brethren. At the time that England was contributing large subscriptions in favour of the suffering Greeks, the Americans likewise collected a sum of money for the same benevolent purpose; but, having seen the manner in which the English subscriptions were squandered, without the Greeks deriving any benefit therefrom, they resolved to keep the money in their own hands, and issue it in such manner as the agents of their Committee in Greece should determine. Dr. Howe commenced his operations at Ægina during the time that the island was crowded with fugitives from every part of Greece, many of whom were literally starving. These he relieved: but, instead of giving the money he was entrusted with to the idle and dissolute, he obliged those he succoured to employ themselves in building the quay at Ægina—thus in a double sense benefiting the country: and when the Turks evacuated this part of the Morea, he entered upon his plan of forming a colony.

The original intention of the American Committee was, that one hundred of the poorest families should be located on this spot, in houses built for them at the expense of the Americans; they were, in like manner, to be provided with seeds, cattle, and agricultural implements, and, in return for their labour, were to pay half the annual produce to the American fund. The Government granted the land to them rent-free during five years, at the termination of which they were to hold it on the same terms as the other lessees of Government. But some difficulties thrown in the way of this scheme by the President prevented Dr. Howe from acting up to the full extent of his original plan,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

nised the Corinth so famed for its luxury, refinement, and wealth. Some ragged, wretched-looking people were lounging about the streets, and there were not more than one hundred cottages standing,—in truth, it appeared to be the most miserable of the ruined towns I had seen in Greece. Exposed to every irruption of the Turks, and alternately possessed by them and the Greeks, it was one of the first towns destroyed, and last rebuilt; and its citadel, the strongest in Greece, and the bulwark of the Peloponnese, constantly attracted the hostile armies. The Turks, who held it in 1821, surrendered by capitulation to Ypsilanti, and were almost all murdered by his unruly soldiery. The Greeks then placed a small garrison in it; but the chief in command, on hearing that the Turks were advancing, deserted his post without even awaiting their arrival, and the Turks immediately took possession of the works, and held them until the defeat of their army in the defiles near Nemea, when a rigorous blockade having reduced them to great straits from want of provisions, they again surrendered.

We climbed the precipitous Acropolis, and during our walk were completely drenched by the rain, which fell in torrents, and deprived us of the magnificent view from the citadel. After passing through three ranges of formidable fortifications, which however did not prove strong enough to repel the Turks of former days, we entered the body of the fortresses. The area was full of ruined houses. Near the house occupied by the commandant were some broken columns, and statues of white marble found within the works; and some parts of the inner wall were of Cyclopiian workmanship. What we saw of the Acro-corinthus did not recompense us for the labour of ascending to such a height; and as we could obtain no shelter there, we were obliged to descend without obtaining a sight of the country beneath us. In the town are seven columns of a Doric temple supposed to have been dedicated either to Venus or Neptune: they bear the marks of great antiquity, and are singular, as the shafts are formed of but one piece. A few ruins of Roman brick are likewise to be seen.

On our return to Dr. Howe's, Captain Gordon and I wished each other good-b'y, very much to my regret; he being on his way to Constantinople, whilst I intended proceeding to the westward.

Basiliko, a wretched hamlet, six miles from Corinth, occupies the site of Sicyon, the capital of the most ancient kingdom in Greece. The ancient theatre is perfect, and from the seats there is a magnificent view of the Gulf of Corinth, Parnassus, Mount Helicon, and the Acro-corinthus: the Stadium is also curious, being lengthened from the mountain by a projecting bastion of Cyclopiian workmanship. The sight of these two ruins scarcely compensated me for the wretchedness of my night's lodging in a peasant's hut, where, however, the rude hospitality of its inmates was exerted to render me comfortable. One of the young men had been summoned to enter the Tacticoes, and his family were loud in exclaiming against the cruelty of separating children from their parents in their old age; and declared that it would be better to fly to the mountains on the approach of the Turks, and wage, as before, a war of extermination. They seemed to believe that a man who entered the regular troops would be for ever lost to his family; and the wife of one of the speakers was vehement in her remarks upon the subject. "So then," said I, "instead of having the Turks kept away from you by an army of Tacticoes, you wish to see them back again?"

"See the Turks!—When hair grows on the palm of my hand, then shall I wish to see a Turk!" was her indignant answer.*

* If the weather had been more favourable, I intended to have proceeded from hence to the Lake of Phonia, one of the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

great port." I gave the answers called for by these questions; and then he entertained me with an account of his currants. Currants form the principal produce of this part of the Morea, and a strema of currant land is worth about five hundred piastres; the returns are very great; but at the present moment there is no demand for them; and all the peasants complained that the storehouses were heaped full of currants which they could not dispose of.

A peasant here brought me a lachrymalia in such preservation, that I offered him half a dollar for it. My landlord winked to him to ask more; and as I did not choose to be imposed upon, I walked away. In the evening it was again shown to me; but when I increased in my offer, the man refused to sell it, and I since ascertained that the landlord, supposing it to be of great value, had bought it for a few paras, and was convinced by my anxiety to purchase it that I had not offered the real value. He hopes to sell it for a large sum to some English Milordo.

The scirocco, with its attendant rain, detained us one day at Kato, but in the evening a change of weather was notified to us, not by the wind, for all was still, but by the roaring of the sea. The air was not in the least agitated, the clouds still floated round the mountains, and the sea had been equally tranquil; but suddenly breakers began to roll upon the shore, and the waves sounded as if disturbed by a gale of wind. Theodore came joyfully to acquaint me that the maestro was going to blow, and that we should have a fine day on the morrow, and several hours afterwards the north wind rushed down from the opposite mountains with tremendous gusts, and, when morning broke, had cleared away all the vapours of the scirocco.

The scenery near the road along the seashore, from Kato towards Patras, is of unequalled beauty: on one side there is the Gulf of Corinth, hemmed in by Mount Helicon, and the snow-capped Parnassus; and on the other ranges of mountains fall abruptly to the sea, and are covered with magnificent pineasters, cypress trees, arbutus, and myrtle, growing down to the edge of the surf. Numerous torrents rush from the mountains, and often render the road impassable after a fall of rain; and the water of the gulf is discoloured for a great distance by the mud they carry with them, and which must gradually cause the land to gain upon the sea. Although so beautiful, this district is not considered healthy; and during a ride of four hours, we saw no habitations, but we then came to some currant plantations, where two new houses had been erected of such good materials, that they betokened the owners to be in affluent circumstances. Khans have also been established at short distances along the road: at one of these we slept, and the people told me that at the village of Zacholi, a short distance further on, a peasant, when digging in his currant ground, had discovered some ancient marbles, and that on the hill above were the ruins of a Palæo Castro, built with enormous stones.

On my way to Zacholi I met all the villagers, male and female, hurrying forth to prune their currant vines along the shore, and from the ruddy complexions of the women, and the stout forms of the men, it was evident that at least this beautiful spot was free from the Morea fever. The marbles shown to me consisted of five small columns of bad workmanship; but from the large stones in the vicinity, it would appear that they belonged to some ancient temple.

Beyond this, where the mountains running down to the sea caused a narrow pass, were some ancient vestiges, and the modern entrenchments occupied by the Greeks when they cut off the retreat of the Turkish army advancing to the relief of Patras in 1822.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

our tambours, with our muskets levelled, ready to fire:—they did not perceive us until within sixty yards' distance, when they rushed forward at full speed, with their heads bowed low on their horses' necks, and making the rocks resound with the shouts of 'Allah, Allah, Allah!' We fired—down fell the foremost; some, in the confusion of the moment, rolled over the precipice; many were killed; and the main body retired to the centre of the plain, whence they sent detachments to force the other passes, but found that all were closed against them; reinforcements had joined us, and there was not an accessible point in the surrounding hills unoccupied by our comrades. The Turks now, with sullen apathy, retreated to the extreme verge of the plain, and crowded together out of reach from our musketry;—in two days they consumed their small stock of provisions; on the third they slaughtered their horses, and for some time existed upon this food; at last this resource failed them, and they preyed upon one another! There we saw them, lying upon the ground in the agonies of death, and calling out to us, 'Effendi! Rayah! have pity, give us food;' but we heeded them not until they offered to surrender; and then three hundred living skeletons were all that remained out of the three thousand gallant horsemen who attacked us. ‘Eh Panagia! Panagia!’” said the narrator in terminating his tale, “the Turks will molest us no more. I hear that a king is coming with ten thousand men, and we shall have nothing more to fear from them.”

Who but Osmanlis would have submitted to be starved in this manner, whilst they had arms in their hands? But, as a writer justly observed of them on a similar occasion, they fell “the victims of destiny.”

CHAPTER XI.

We proceed towards Megaspoleon.—Arrive at the Convent.—Remarks of the Monks upon religion.—The Church.—Picture of the Holy Virgin painted by St. Luke.—Origin of the Monastery.—Wealth of the Priests.—The Library.—Ibrahim repulsed from Megaspoleon.—Vostizza.—Lepanto.—Castles of the Morea and Roumelia.—Patras.—Hadgi Christo's irregular Cavalry.—Society at Patras.—Embark for Zante.—Remarks.

THE road towards the celebrated monastery of Megaspoleon strikes inland from Acrata; and after ascending the mountains for a couple of hours, we were soon made sensible of the difference in the temperature betwixt the high land and the plains; the snow was lying on the ground to a considerable depth, and yet I had bathed in the gulf the evening before.

The scenery was varied and imposing, and the inhabitants were apparently as wild as their country. At an open glade, near a pine forest,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

were three boys, with shepherds' crooks in their hands, tending a flock of sheep. I was in front of my Greeks; and when the little people saw me, they uttered a wild shout of alarm, and ran away as fast as they could for a hundred yards; they then ventured to look again, the two smallest boys hiding themselves behind their taller companions, and occasionally peeping on either side. I called out to them; but my voice, instead of soothing their fears, only created a greater panic, and off they ran again, screaming most piteously, until an old shepherd came to their assistance; and he, though not more civilized than the children in his appearance, explained to them that I was neither the devil nor a Turk.

After emerging from a gloomy glen that reminded me of the Alps, we crossed a ridge whence there was a view of the valley of the Calavrita river, and midway up one of the mountains I saw some buildings near Megaspileon, which was as yet concealed from our view. The muleteers, as they looked towards it, crossed themselves, and uttered a short prayer, and then we descended the mountain. It was not, however, until we had passed two entrenchments thrown across the narrow road, and turned round a precipitous rock, that we obtained a sight of the convent, which is cer-

or tambours, with
t. fire:—they did n
sxy yards' distance, a full speed, with teir horses' necks, a sand with the shou
Ye fired—down fell onfusion of the mo
jee; many were ki rtired to the centre ant detachments t ht found that all inforcements had ot an accessible Hs unoccupied by dw, with sullen a tme verge of the ter out of reach to days they cons provisions; on the t horses, and for some t a last this resource f
von one another!
von the ground in t
ig out to us, 'Effen
u food;' but we hee fied to surrender; a ig skeletons were a tree thousand galla

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

tainly one of the most extraordinary spectacles I ever beheld. In front of the spectator is a perpendicular wall of rock, several hundred feet in height, surmounted by the buildings I had first remarked, which were intended as fortifications. Immediately under the precipice there is an immense cave, entirely concealed by the convent, a singular structure eight stories high, and full of windows and galleries. A great part of the building runs back under the cave, and the summit of the precipice projects so much, that when the Albanians, in 1780, attempted to destroy the convent by hurling rocks from above, they all fell clear of it. Near the monastery are some smaller edifices, and in front the ground is laid out in terraces, planted with vegetables and fruit trees; in the glen beneath rushes the turbid waters of the Calavrita river, and around are lofty mountains clad with pines and cypress trees, and their summits covered with snow.

Near the ancient gate of the convent, many of the monks, clad in black garments, were seated enjoying the evening breeze; and, as a contrast to their peaceable occupation, I observed a piece of field-artillery pointed down the pass.

When we approached, a monk stepped forward to enquire our errand, and then asked us to sit down, whilst he submitted my passport to the examination of the Hegoumenos (or prior), who shortly afterwards sent permission for us to enter. He was seated in a vaulted gallery looking out upon the valley, and around were several of the principal monks: his long white beard, resting on his black robes, had a striking effect; and in his hand he bore a wand, I suppose the badge of office. His manners were courteous; and he directed one of the brethren to conduct me to the apartment reserved for the reception of strangers, on the upper story of the building.

I had always formed a very high opinion of the hospitality shown by these religious fraternities to the stranger; and when I recollected the feast I once witnessed in a Portuguese convent, I could not help supposing, that in such a wealthy establishment as this, I should have no reason to complain of my fare. A twelve hours' ride had made me sensible of a troublesome appetite; and it was therefore with much pleasure, when, proceeding to my room, that I espied a fat sheep hanging up in the larder. "Would you like to eat something?" said the priest who had shown me the way to my apartment. "What will you have?"

The proposition delighted me, and I requested that he would prepare some mutton.

“We have not a morsel of mutton in the convent,” replied my interrogator.

“How! no mutton!” (very strange this, thought I) “well then, let me have a fowl.”

The priest shook his head. “It is now too late to kill one,” said he; “but you shall have some meat to-morrow.”

I began to feel alarmed, and begged him to recollect that I had eaten nothing all day. “You shall have some eggs,” replied the Pappas.

In this arrangement I was obliged to acquiesce: and after waiting an hour, a table was brought in with great ceremony; and the sub-prior, a fat, sleek, comfortable-looking man, who evidently did not like fasting often himself, however he may have prescribed it to others, placed himself at one end of the table, whilst I sat at the other. Some bread and wine were put upon the board, and presently a Caloyer came in bearing a covered dish. I lifted the cover, and beheld six poached eggs, intended as a dinner for three hungry men! Theodore, seeing dismay pictured on my countenance, said that he had brought some small fish, and would send them to be fried: and shortly afterwards he returned, exclaiming, that the monks had kept half of them below!

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

up arms to drive the Turks out of Europe. If the Allied Powers would allow us, we could conquer the Turks ourselves. What are they, the infidels! See then," continued he, "what Capo d'Istrias has been doing. Before he came, we were a poor, ignorant set of beings; and now we have instructors to teach us the French, Italian, and English languages!" I was indeed surprised at this intelligence, and expressed a wish to see these professors, but was told that they would be presented to me in the morning; and when morning came, the learned masters were still invisible; the whole story being an invention of the priest's to impose upon my credulity.

A book was next brought to me that had been sent them as a present by an Englishman; and although it was the Bible, not one of them had looked into it beyond the title page. This brought on a discussion relative to religion, in which the Pappas displayed profound erudition, as may be inferred from his final remark: "The English and French," said he, "are good Christians, although they differ a little from us in the forms of their religion; but as for the Italians and the Patriarch of Rome, eh! Panagia! the damnable heretics! they are worse than the Turks!"

The next morning, at an early hour, the bell rang for matins, and I went to the church where high mass was performing. It is a gloomy, dingy place, with a curious tessellated pavement; and, like other Greek churches, be-dizened around with daubs, representing the various saints of their creed. The lamps and ornaments are all of silver; and the greatest treasure is a rich silver case ornamented with precious stones, and containing the original picture of the Holy Virgin, by St. Luke; but although ——“ painters always, more or less, Flatter the features they express,” the Apostle cannot be taxed with having followed the general example. Instead of being a painting, as its name implies, this relic is a kind of basso relievo, cut in black wood; it reminded me of an Otaheitan God, and is far inferior in personal charms to Our Lady of Loretto, who is not remarkable for her beauty. When the priest opened the case, some Greeks who were present rushed forward to kiss the frame, and stare at the idol with genuine credulity—it appeared to me, that notwithstanding the abhorrence professed by the Greeks for images, this representation of the Virgin ought certainly to be considered one; and therefore that, without acknowledging it, the worshippers at this shrine are in the daily habit of sinning against the fundamental rules of their Church.

The tradition relative to the foundation of the monastery is, that in the fifth century, some holy men fled from Salonica to avoid the persecution of the heathens, and finding this extraordinary cave, and the painting of the Virgin near the fountain, resolved upon remaining here during the rest of their lives. But they first had a dangerous enemy to encounter, in a winged serpent, who had taken up his abode in a cleft of the rock: this was the Evil One! However, the hermits were resolved not to give up the point; and having piled some dry bushes at the entrance of the cave, they set fire to them, and obliged the dragon to fly away. The religious reputation of the cave soon became established, and the Emperors Cantacuzene and Constantine Palæologos bestowed great privileges upon it; since then it has yearly increased its territory and influence, both of which are now very great, notwithstanding that the monks expended much money during the war, and profess at the present moment to be very poor.

The monastery contains two hundred brethren, of whom eighty are priests, and their

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

them a great influence over the surrounding peasantry, and averse as they must be to all intellectual improvement amongst their tenants, as prejudicial to their own authority, we may feel certain that their power will always be exerted to counteract the views of an enlightened government, and still preserve the darkness that hangs over the minds of the peasantry. Megaspelion ought to be converted into a national college. The President has tried to impose upon those who are interested in the affairs of Greece, by giving them to understand, that his attention is much devoted to the furtherance of public education ; and for this purpose the Government paper is filled with correspondence betwixt him and various schoolmasters ; but, in fact, nothing has been done. Where the priests have been appointed masters of the schools, they are scarcely less ignorant than their pupils ; and it is with them that education should commence. This would be an excellent spot for an university, and the revenues of the convent would defray the expenses.

The monks showed me their library, in the smallest room of the convent ; but it contained merely a few Greek and Latin books upon theological subjects ; the latter had never been read, and were only known to be Latin from report; and the dust which had gathered on the Greek volumes appeared likewise to have been long unmolested. I enquired whether they possessed any manuscripts, and was shown an illuminated Psalter, which they had the impudence to say was written one thousand three hundred years ago; perhaps they believed so. I was next conducted to the cellar, said to contain four hundred thousand okas of wine, in large casks, each holding thirty-two thousand okas.* The refectory, where, on certain occasions, the priests dine together, had not a very social appearance; on ordinary days, each monk receives a loaf of bread and quart of wine, which he takes to his cell. Their cells are very comfortable; and, although they profess to lead a life of celibacy, I saw sundry female forms gliding through the gloomy passages: so it would seem that they do not consider their sacred building polluted by the presence of the sex.

During the war, the monks of Megaspelion were not backward in joining the cause of independence; and the cross in one hand, and Tophaic in the other, they slew infidels, and absolved Christians in the most orthodox manner.

* An oka, equal to two quarts.

When, however, Ibrahim commenced his depredations, they limited their exertions to the defence of the monastery; they fortified the approaches to it with great judgment; two field-pieces were placed in battery at the most assailable point, and above them rose a huge cross, which, planted on the brink of a precipice, had a very imposing effect, and was well calculated to remind the combatants, that the cause for which they fought was that of religion as well as of liberty, and that the war with the Moslem was one of extermination.

Some hundred Albanians, who had no objection to the good wine in the cellar, or to the piastres of the priests, were taken into pay; and the neighbouring peasantry, with their families and moveable property, sought refuge within the walls; so that when the advanced-guard of Ibrahim's columns debouched from the mountain pass of Calavrita, the number of combatants within the entrenchments of Megaspoleon amounted to one thousand men, well resolved to hold their ground, and defend all that they held most dear on earth — the monks, their riches and the Panagia; the Albanians, the cellar; and the peasants, their live stock and families. On the other hand, Ibrahim was instigated by the hope of seizing the reported wealth

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

confession was so candid and quaint, that I placed thirty piastres in his hand, as a requital for his poached eggs and sour wine; and then, having received his benediction, or more probably curse, I issued through the convent-gate, and gladly bent my steps down the hill.

The road to Vostizza crosses a ridge of mountains, and enters the plain on the sea-shore, near where the Vostizza river, a rapid, and, at this season of the year, dangerous stream, runs into the gulf a little on the east side of Vostizza: seventeen persons had been drowned in attempting to cross the stream at different times during this winter; but I effected the passage without much difficulty, and reached Vostizza on the morning of the 11th of February. The town contained a few good houses; the country around was highly cultivated; and in the harbour a large English merchant brig was anchored. Previous to the Revolution, Vostizza contained several wealthy inhabitants, and was possessed of a brisk trade; but since then, the enormous duties imposed by the Greek Government has caused a stagnation in commerce, and the brig was the only vessel that had come to this part of Greece for a cargo during the last year. Two hours' distance beyond Vostizza, we came to the ruins of a large khan on the banks of the sea; myrtle bushes grew around, and the mountains were beautifully wooded.

The gulf here becomes narrower; and on the opposite shore we saw Lepanto, which, being built on the side of a steep hill, is quite exposed to the sea. It was in this part of the gulf that the naval power of the Turks received its memorable check from the united fleet of Christendom, commanded by Don John of Austria; and now, opposite to the town, the naval force of independent Greece was anchored—for so the Hellas frigate may be considered. This superb ship is kept in commission at an enormous expense, although her services are no longer required; and for several months past she has been anchored off Lepanto, serving merely as a tender to Count Augustin Capo d'Istrias, who, as Commander in Chief of the forces in Western Greece, has fixed his headquarters at Lepanto. She bears the flag of Admiral Miaulis. As she is fir built, and consequently not calculated to last many years, the Greeks ought now to sell her to Mahommed Ali, who would, in all probability, become a willing purchaser. In her present state, Greece only requires a few gun-brigs to protect her merchant vessels from the depredations of pirates.

A few miles beyond the Khan, a beautiful cascade falls from a perpendicular height of several hundred feet; and it is remarkable as being almost the only waterfall in the Morea. We next obtained a view of Capes Rhium and Antirrhium, two low points of land stretching out from the opposite shores, and forming a barrier to the Gulf of Lepanto. The castles of Morea and Roumelia are built at the extremities of the capes, and completely command the entrance to the gulf. When the French army, commanded by Marshal Maison, landed in Greece for the purpose of expelling the Turks, the Morea Castle was garrisoned by one thousand five hundred men, who refused to surrender; and the French were obliged to besiege it in form, whilst his Majesty's ships Ætna and Blonde bombarded. The greater part of the Turks escaped to the coast of Roumelia; and when the remainder agreed to capitulate, only three hundred men laid down their arms, in presence of a besieging force of ten thousand.

The castle is not more than two hours' distance from Patras; but it was so late when we reached it, that we were obliged to pursue our journey in the dark. The country was intersected by ravines and ditches, and the darkness magnified every danger so much, that we were literally obliged to feel our way--now plunging

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

luxury and amusements; and a cloaca maxima would be a more praiseworthy work than the most magnificent theatre in the world.

Patras is just as dirty as any other Moreot town; and that is saying every thing. Last year, the prevalence of fever in the lower town, in consequence of the accumulation of filth and stagnate water, was so great, that three hundred children died there, whilst in the upper town, which was better drained, only eight were victims to the malady.

The citadel is garrisoned by a battalion of regular troops, and quartered in the town were two hundred irregular cavalry, commanded by Hadji Christo, a chief who distinguished himself at Navarino, where he was taken prisoner by Ibrahim. The men were mostly Bulgarians, who had served in the Turkish army, and deserted to the Greeks; and a field-day they had whilst I was at Patras, gave me a good opportunity of seeing them. The drummer of the troop, dressed like a Turkish Delhi, rode through the town, beating two small kettle-drums, and presently the men came riding in to the place of rendezvous; they were dressed in all ways: some wore the Emir's turban of green; others had shawls wrapped round their heads, with the ends flying in the wind; and some were in Greek costume ; they were for the most part well mounted upon Turkish horses, with Oriental housings ; and with pistols in belt, and scimitar in hand, made rather a gallant show. When the muster was completed, Hadji Christo's lieutenant led the way to a plain near the town ; where, having separated into two parties, they commenced a mock fight, now galloping out and attacking singly, or throwing the djereed, and then skirmishing in groups, all the while abusing each other as Turks and Giaours. One party then charged the other in line, and was met at speed with such spirit that three horses were overthrown ; and I expected to see the sham fight converted into a real battle. The arrival of these men, who are notorious for their predatory and unceremonious habits, created great consternation at Patras, and it was rumoured that they came for the purpose of arresting Zaimi, the ex-president, a person whose influence and liberal views afford much uneasiness to Capo d'Istrias ; but as he has had the sense to remain perfectly quiet, the Government have no excuse for seizing his person. Capo d'Istrias either believed, or affected to believe, that a masonic association had been formed at Patras, composed of the French and English, and those Greeks who are disaffected to him, and that the conspirators even aimed at his life. His object in circulating these infamous reports is obviously to render the French and English odious to the Greeks ; but his measures betoken so much meanness and littleness of mind, that they will only redound to his own discredit. He feels that the measures pursued by him will not stand the test of discussion ; and as he knows that he has exposed himself to the criticism of the world, he winces under the slightest lash of satire.

A small society has been formed at Patras, and the Greek ladies there seem determined to take the lead in civilizing themselves. There had been two masked balls just before my arrival ; and, what is a convincing proof of their progress, and that they are beginning to think for themselves, — an elopement ! The lady, daughter of the Russian Vice-consul, and the lover a lieutenant, whose sole income amounted to forty pounds a-year, ran off to the Morea castle ; whence the bride very properly sent to beg Mamma's pardon, promised never to do so again, and asked for some clothes. Mamma, who was accustomed to the good old Greek mode of betrothing a year or two before the marriage-day, was scandalized at the proceedings of her daughter. To dare fall in love without her sanction

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

naille,” said he; “and if I had the power, I would hang a few dozen of them daily. Look, Sir, at the way the English act towards them,” continued he, pointing to the four men hanging in chains upon the Zante hill. “Unless the government treat the Greeks in the same manner, they will never be good for any thing!”

On the 16th I arrived at Zante, and was delighted to enter the Lazaretto, and undergo a quarantine of twenty-one days. Although a prisoner, I had a house to cover me, and what was a still greater luxury, and one that I had not enjoyed for three months—a bed!

* * * * *

I had seen enough of Greece to convince me, that although she possesses great capabilities, yet that the future ruler will have a most arduous task to perform in bringing her within the bounds of civilization. Inveterate habits and prejudices must be weeded from the minds of the people, and their irascible passions calmed; a new impulse must be given to the enterprising spirit of her mariners; a lawless soldiery is to be disbanded and thrown loose upon the country; taxation must be enforced; roads made, and justice administered; and to effect these objects, the new Sovereign must be supported by a foreign army, and resolve to govern his subjects with a “ Main de fer et gant de velours.”

The proceedings of Capo d'Istria's assembly at Argos sufficiently demonstrate the incapacity of the Greeks generally to understand the advantages of a representative government; and, therefore, previous to throwing any power into the hands of the delegates from the people, it would be necessary to form municipalities, and thus initiate them in the secrets of election. Municipal power would be so immediately felt by the persons interested, that they would learn to duly estimate the value of having a voice in the nomination of those authorities; and when this feeling becomes generally understood, it will be time to form a representative assembly. In the present state of affairs, the Greek people are so unfit to take any share in the proceedings of the government, that it would be an act of folly to grant them at the onset the constitution which may hereafter be requisite for them. Their debates would only be the efforts of one faction trying to undermine the other; and the partisans of the President's family, anxious to throw every impediment in the way of the new sovereign, under the pretext of demanding constitutional rights, would try to counteract all the measures of the Government. The misrule of the President, during the last two years, has placed the sovereign in a more difficult position than that of Capo d'Istrias in 1827, inasmuch that, in addition to the vices of the Turkish administration, and to the abuses crept in during the war, he has also to unravel the web of Machiavelian texture with which Capo d'Istrias has entangled the country; and so difficult, or rather hopeless, is this task, that his only chance of succeeding will be in severing it at one blow. It is rather amusing to hear some persons, who know nothing of the Greeks except by hearsay, expatiating on the propriety of granting to them at once a constitution similar to our own; they either know not, or wilfully forget, that for four centuries the Greeks have been slaves to the most despotic power in the world; and that, accustomed to be ruled with a rod of iron, it is morally impossible that they should be prepared for a democratic government—the transition is too rapid to be attended with a beneficial result: the materials for a constitution are still in too crude a state to be rendered available

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

whilst their vices are those of example and education. Many writers upon Greece have been lavish in their abuse of the Greeks, and have not hesitated to stigmatise them with every vice that can disgrace mankind ; whilst others, with equal prejudice, have represented them as being so many suffering angels, groaning under the scourge of a tyrant. Both pictures are overdrawn : the Greeks have many more faults than their advocates are led to believe, and fewer vices than their enemies are willing to admit : and a person going to Greece, prejudiced either one way or the other, will find himself much undeceived. Whilst they were a suffering people, they were meek, cringing, and submissive ; and when success attended their arms, they became vindictive, cruel, and rapacious : but such are the characteristics of man in an uneducated state, and are applicable not to the Greeks alone, but to many other nations. The whole bent of their learning, during the Turkish rule, was to afford them an opportunity of exerting their talents for intrigue to the best advantage : morality, virtue, honour, were terms the signification of which was obsolete ; of what use could they be within the precincts of a Pasha's court ? Religion had been absorbed in superstition ; and it is a matter of surprise, that the Greeks should possess any virtues whatever. The merits or demerits of the Greeks will, however, soon cease to be a matter of discussion ; their regeneration is about to commence ; they will soon be united with the great European family ; and in the course of a very few years we may hope to see them rapidly approximating to the state of civilization attained by the other nations of Europe.*

* Since the foregoing pages were written, the abdication of Prince Leopold has been made public ; and one cannot but regret that the Greeks should have been deprived of a Sovereign who, whatever Capo d'Istrias may say to the contrary, would have been well received by the nation. Capo d'Istrias was anxious to free himself from British influence and a British Prince, and hopes, no doubt, to direct the councils of the future Sovereign.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ON THE NAVAL AND MILITARY POWER OF THE
OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

THE changes that have taken place of late years in the government of the Porte, and the various innovations made by Sultan Mahmoud on the customs and prejudices of the Ottomans, caused the attention of all Europe to centre in the East; and the thirst for information relative to Turkey is still far from being assuaged. Never was there a people so often described, and yet so little understood, as the Ottomans: the rapidity and splendour of their conquests in early days called for the admiration as well as alarm of Christendom; the causes of their prosperity were in vain sought for; they were considered to be endowed with supernatural courage and enterprise; and the difference of manners existing betwixt them and the rest of Europe, prevented a thorough inquiry into their real power. Sultan succeeded sultan, and each was supposed to mount a throne powerful and firm as that of Suleiman; but, in the course of time, it was discovered that this unchanging position was, in fact, undermining the stability of the empire; for whilst civilization advanced in other nations, in Turkey it remained stationary.

The science of war, which the Turks in the first instance improved upon to their advantage, had now attained such perfection in Christendom that the Ottoman tactics were of but little avail: the innate courage of the Spahis and Janissaries was rendered nugatory by the well-directed operations of a numerous artillery; and in the beginning of the eighteenth century, the victories of Prince Eugene of Savoy first opened the eyes of Europe as to the real character of the Turks, and proved that it was as easy to defeat them as any other nation. Reverse followed reverse; Russia and Austria yearly encroached upon the Ottoman Empire; and yet no effort was made by the Porte to correct the vicious organization of its forces, and place itself on a par, in scientific advancement, with the other European states. Europe

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

lection of past victories, and confident of future success, that his attempts at reform were fruitless, and ultimately caused his dethronement and death. Mahmoud then appeared upon the scene as a reformer, and hitherto has been able to enforce his wishes; but he has a people to deal with already chastened by their reverses, and much decreased in numbers.

The fanaticism of the Mahomedans has in part disappeared, but their fatalism still remains in full force, and they firmly believe that the end of their European empire is approaching; they feel that they are no longer conquerors in the field, and that, even when victors, their laurels are barren, — the hopes of a place in Paradise hereafter are not so tempting as were the spoils of Hungary and Austria. The plunder of a Russian camp offers no incitement to their cupidity or sensuality. The talisman contained in the word “home” has no influence on them; they came as conquerors, have lived and ruled as conquerors, and thus are not in the least identified with the soil. The love of one’s family, which converts an European rustic into a hero, cannot be expected to excite those to battle who are sensualists in love, and strangers to esteem. Mere animal passions are therefore the main springs of their actions, and these, unsupported by mind, can never be productive of any great result. The Turks are ambitious, but merely because successful ambition creates power, and power enables them to gratify their feelings whether of love or hate.

With these materials, Mahmoud has undertaken to form a disciplined army; and, although he has had many difficulties to encounter, he has hitherto triumphed over them, and prosecuted the advancement of his favourite scheme.

The remodelling of the maritime force has also attracted his attention: and in the following pages I will try to point out the progress he has made in his undertaking. A residence of several weeks at Constantinople afforded me ample opportunities of inquiring into the establishments of the Porte; and the Turkish officers showed themselves extremely anxious to oblige and assist me.

OTTOMAN ARMY.

At the period when the Ottomans first became formidable to Europe, they may be said to have composed one immense army; each Osmanli was a soldier, and could not refuse his services to the common cause, as long as he was able to bear arms; and from the age of sixteen to sixty they held themselves at the disposal of the state. Their unpaid services were not, however, unrequited; a third of the conquered land was distributed amongst them, and held on tenure of military service, which was limited from April to October. The conquered peasantry cultivated the lands thus ceded to the soldiery, and paid the rents to the landlords; and the larger grants, called Ziamets, being of more than five hundred, and the lesser, or Timars, of from three to five hundred acres, the Osmanlis, thus provided for, received ample remuneration for their services. But this sys-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

mies, and, wherever they go, may they return with a white face!"

At this time, there was not a single power in Christendom that maintained a regular body of troops in its pay: the Christian armies were raised at the will of the nobility, who brooked no superior, and seized the first pretext to leave the armies of their sovereign, and return with their vassals to their strongholds; the advantages of union against a common enemy were not sufficiently felt; and victory declared in favour of those troops who to courage and enthusiasm united discipline and a blind subservience to the will of their rulers. Such were the Janissaries: they swept all before them; and whilst the capture of Christians furnished slaves to supply the vacancies in their ranks, so long did fortune smile upon them; but when the Janissaries ceased to form a separate class from the mass of the nation, when they were allowed to marry and enrol their children, and that the *Odas were encumbered with men who preferred an inglorious life, in the retirement of their families, to the dangers of a hard-fought field; the Janissaries ceased to be formidable to their enemies, and, like the Prætorian guards, were only dreaded by their Emperors.

* The companies, or regiments, were so called.

Yet on this class of men did the Porte depend for defence against her foes; and although their inefficiency became daily more apparent, no reform could be effected in the system. In vain did Selim attempt to remodel them; his life paid the forfeit of his temerity. In vain did Mahmoud, on his accession to the throne, wish to enforce the strict regulations of "Suleiman the Magnificent." An insurrection was the consequence, which, during three days, inundated his capital with blood, and obliged him, in self-defence, to command the execution of his brother. The stern disposition of Mahmoud was not, however, daunted by this failure: he now saw that nothing less than the entire destruction of the Janissaries would enable him to improve the situation of his empire; and he patiently waited until he could strike a blow with the certainty of success. In 1826, the Janissaries again mutinied; but they found the Sultan prepared, and they gave but the signal for their own destruction. The artillery-men and other troops faithful to the Sultan surrounded them in the Etmeidan. They attempted to defend themselves, but without success, and twenty thousand perished. It is not within the limits of this book to give the details of an occurrence which has already been well described ; and I merely allude to the circumstance, as connecting the modern military system of the Turks with that of ancient days.

The suppression of the corps of Janissaries having left Mahmoud at liberty to remodel his army in such manner as appeared best suited to the times, he hastened to supply the void occasioned by the destruction of the only force in the empire ; and orders were issued, directing the enrolment of a certain number of men from every province, with the exception of Albania, Bosnia, and the African states. But the Sultan found more difficulty in raising his new troops than had been anticipated ; for although the law existed in full force, placing the services of every Moslem at the disposal of the Sultan, this only applied to a period of war ; and no instance occurred formerly of the present system of enrolment, which was consequently viewed with suspicion by the populace. Another drawback to the speedy formation of an army, was the necessity of excluding from the new corps all persons suspected of Janissarism ; and as it had been customary for every Moslem, on attaining the age of manhood, to inscribe his name in the odas of the Janissaries, the only method by which Mahmoud could hope to secure his troops from

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

military talent; and the forty thousand regulars who served under him were certainly better troops than had yet been led into action; but the battle of Kuleftscha inflicted a final blow on the spirit of the army; part of it dispersed, and only twenty thousand men retired with the Grand Vizir to Shumla. The result of that campaign is well known, and I shall therefore proceed to detail the condition of the Ottoman army at the commencement of this year.

* * * * *

The Ottoman army is composed of regular and irregular cavalry and infantry, a corps of artillery, and a regiment of bombardiers, or miners.

REGULAR ARMY—INFANTRY.

The Assakiri Mansurei Mohamédiyés, (victorious troops of Mahomet,) or regular infantry, are said to amount to fifty thousand men, and ten thousand of these compose the Imperial guard, quartered in and around Constantinople. The latter were the troops I had an opportunity of seeing, and are similar in their organization and equipment to the troops of the line. They are recruited from the mass of the people, without distinction; and although the Sultan did not oblige the children of his nobility to enter the service, yet, at the beginning of the war, many voluntarily enlisted; and even some of the Ulemas, or expounders of the law, forsook their peaceable profession, and enrolled themselves. The black and white subjects of the Sultan are alike received as soldiers; and one may see in a regiment the various shades of the human countenance, from the jet black complexion of the Ethiop to the fair-faced inhabitant of Roumelia. “Ah!” said an ex-janissary to me one day, “what kind of soldiers are these? You see every race, and every colour on the earth, amongst them!”—The mixture has certainly a grotesque appearance. Once enrolled, a soldier is obliged to serve for life; but it often happens that discharges are granted.

ORGANIZATION OF THE REGULAR INFANTRY.

The regular troops are organized on the model of the French army, and are divided into corps d'armées, divisions, brigades, and regiments. The corps d'armée is commanded by a Seraskier; the division by a Pasha of three tails; the brigade by a Pasha of two tails; the regiment, consisting of three battalions, by a Miri-alaÿ; and the battalion by a Bimbashee.

A regiment is thus divided:—

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the military profession to be learnt by hearsay, in an European army ; the causes of a military movement are explained, and the necessity of internal discipline made apparent to all : —but in the Turkish army there is no one to look up to ; the same ignorance pervades all ranks ; and, unless they have the benefit of example, we cannot expect them to make a rapid advance in their discipline.

The Turks appear to think, that performing the manual and platoon exercises with a tolerable degree of precision, marching in companies instead of independently, and wearing a peculiar kind of dress, is sufficient to class them with disciplined troops ; but in their anxiety to perfect themselves they overlook the only means by which perfection can be attained. The soldier is placed in the ranks before he knows how to march : provided that he goes through the exercise, it matters not whether his carriage is steady or not. When in the ranks, the men talk and laugh without restraint, and even address themselves to the officers ; and the latter, instead of reprehending their soldiers, join in the laugh. The line drawn betwixt the privates and subaltern officers is not sufficiently distinct, although the field-officers are treated with the most obsequious respect by their inferiors ; and it is easy to perceive throughout that the hand of a master is wanting to combine all the elements of discipline, which are now but imperfectly understood, and to impress upon the higher ranks, that, before they are capable of commanding, it is requisite for them to study their profession, and make up by their theoretical knowledge, for their want of experience.

I was not so fortunate as to witness any grand review of the new troops, but often saw them marching in small bodies, when, although a military formation was adhered to, their movements were so unsteady that they did not offer a favourable sample of the proficiency they had made in discipline. They went through the firelock exercise much better than I had expected.

It would be unfair, however, to blame the Ottomans for a laxity of discipline at present, when so short a time has elapsed since their armies were in a complete state of insubordination; and it may be prudent, in the onset, to allow the troops a little latitude, whilst the Janissaries are fresh in their recollection, and gradually to tighten the reins hereafter. There however appears to be a good feeling in the army at present: the men seem capable of being made excellent soldiers; to the undoubted courage of their race, they unite sobriety and obedience to their superiors ; and, to judge by their cheerful, careless manner, are free from the gloomy fanaticism of the Janissaries. These good qualities may partly be attributed to their youth, many of the recruits not being more than twelve years of age ; and although this circumstance was disadvantageous to them during the war with Russia, yet if the Porte is allowed a few years' peace, these boys will form a body of men well affected to the Government, and sufficiently numerous and powerful to lead the opinions of the conscripts who from time to time may be added to them.

DRESS OF THE REGULAR TROOPS.

The dress and equipment of the army, which in other countries would be considered in a secondary point of view, has presented more difficulties to the Sultan than any other of his undertakings ; for so perfectly were the Turks wedded to their ancient costume, that any alteration was viewed with disgust by the nation. No dress could certainly be more graceful than the flowing robe and shawl-turban of the Osmanlis ; but it was badly adapted for an infantry soldier : it impeded his movements in advancing,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

but they came forward with one accord, and declared that they would not submit to be dressed like Europeans. Since then there has been a change in their sentiments ; and I have no doubt but that, before long, we shall see the Turks wearing the European chako.

The uniform of the guards is a round blue jacket with red cuffs and collar ; but the jackets never fit the men, and have consequently a very slovenly appearance. In summer, a white cotton jacket is substituted for the other. The trowsers are blue cloth in winter, and white cotton in summer ; they hang in large slovenly bags down to the knee, where they are gathered in, and fit close to the leg, as low as the ankle. (They remind one forcibly of the nether garments of a Dutch burgomaster in the time of Van Ostade.)

Another great innovation has been made, by obliging the soldiers of the guards to wear European shoes fastened with buckles, instead of the clumsy Turkish boots. A coarse brown great coat, with hood like that of a monk, completes the dress of a Turkish soldier.

The accoutrements of the guards are made of very bad materials. They consist of a pouch and belt of black leather ; the former containing fifty rounds of ammunition. A belt of similar materials is worn round the waist; and the bayonet, which has superseded the ataghan, is carried in a frog attached to this. Fifty years ago, the Turks refused to admit the bayonet amidst their weapons; and it was only after the Mufti had publicly pronounced a blessing upon it, and declared that its use would be advantageous to the true believers, that they sanctioned its introduction! Goat-skin knapsacks contain the cooking utensils and spare clothes of the men; and their great-coats are strapped on them in a very careless manner. Each soldier is provided with a leather bottle for water.

The following articles are issued to a soldier annually, at the expense of the Government :

For a Private in the Imperial Guard.	Necessaries issued annually.
	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> 1 Blue cloth jacket. 1 White cotton ditto. 1 Pair of white trowsers. 1 Pair of blue ditto. 2 Pair of shoes. 1 Fez (red cap).

The uniform of the officers is similar to that of the men, except that they wear trowsers nearly like our own, and European boots. Their cloaks also are the same as ours ; and I have seen some of the young men dressed very well, and even wearing gloves. The degrees of rank are denoted by a star and crescent, worn upon the left breast. These ornaments are made of gold or silver for the junior officers, and set in diamonds for the higher ranks. Each regiment has a green standard, with the star and crescent embroidered thereon in gold.

PROMOTION.

Promotion in the regular army is to take place by seniority ; but although this rule has been laid down, the Sultan frequently advances those officers who bring themselves to his notice by their talent and knowledge of tactics ; and many of the regiments are commanded by very young men, who are not ashamed to acknowledge their backwardness in science. Indeed, I met several Turkish officers who scrupled not to own that they were inferior to the Franks in their military system ; and they seemed anxious to improve themselves by inquiry. The older men are more conceited, and fancy their system to be exceedingly good.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

differs a little, but not materially, from that of the soldiers.

REGULAR CAVALRY.

The Turks have been at all times famed for their cavalry ; but their organization was so different from that of European dragoons, that the Sultan has hitherto failed in effecting much improvement in this arm. He has himself been indefatigable in learning to ride in an European saddle with long stirrups, and has acquired an excellent seat ; but the four squadrons of dragoons attached to the guard, and composing the only regular cavalry in the empire, are not remarkable for their military appearance. Mr. Calosso, a ci-devant captain of dragoons in Eugene's army of Italy, having been obliged to fly from Piedmont, in consequence of the part he took during the Revolution, offered his services to the Sultan, and has since been employed as the instructor of his cavalry. Mahmoud was fortunate in meeting with a person of respectability capable of assuming this office, and he has not shown himself ungrateful to Calosso for his exertions : the latter has taught Mahmoud to ride, and to manœuvre a squadron, and the Sultan takes great pleasure in watching the improvement of his guard. The men, however, have not kept pace with the Sultan; they still entertain a great predilection for short stirrups; their seat is loose and ungraceful, and they not unfrequently are thrown from their saddle, much to their disgrace and mortification.

The horses of this corps are very different from what we are in the habit of considering Turkish horses; they are small and ugly, ill conditioned, and badly groomed, and were purchased by the Government wherever they could procure them—in Asia, Roumelia, and Wallachia; but the greater part came from Widdin. Their equipments are bad and dirty, and the men do not dress well. They wear an embroidered blue jacket, trowsers, European boots and spurs; but the boots are never cleaned, and their trowsers, when they are riding, shrink half way up the leg. That effective weapon, the Turkish scimitar, has been rejected to make way for French light dragoon sabres; and as neither the scabbard nor hilts of these have been cleaned since their importation, it may be conceived that these dragoons are not very martial in their appearance.

The officers of the cavalry are however superior to the generality, and some of them pay great attention to their dress. Avney Bey, the Lieutenant-Colonel, and Aid-de-camp to the Sultan, had his uniforms well made, wore a stock, gloves, and well polished boots; and, but for the fez, might be taken for an European officer: but Avney Bey was quite a renegade Turk; half his days were spent amongst the Franks. Whenever he could escape from his duty at Ramah Chiflik, he hastened on board our men-of-war, to join in the conversation, and indulge in the forbidden drink of the unbelievers: he spoke sufficient French to render himself understood, and he was in a fair way to bring down the displeasure of the Prophet, when, unfortunately for him, he incurred that of the Sultan. Mahmoud, who was extremely partial to this young man, had expressed no disapprobation of his conduct, as long as he kept within the bounds of moderation; but it appears, that during the Ramazan, Avney Bey was guilty of great excesses. Now, as the Sultan is rapidly undermining the Mahomedan creed by his innovations, he deems it right to affect outwardly the greatest respect for the ceremonies of his religion; and to punish Avney Bey for his want of discretion, he banished him to Nicomedia, where, however, it is not likely that he will remain long before he is restored to favour.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the troops), conjointly with the Seraskier and other official persons. All the army is registered at this office, and to it the soldiers address themselves, if they have any cause of complaint. The troops are paid monthly; and the following are the rates of pay and number of rations granted to the different ranks.

Rank.	Pay Monthly.	Rations per diem.
	Piastres.	Okas of meat.	Loaves of bread.
Miri Alay (Colonel)	1500	8	24
Caimacan do. (Lt. Col.)	1200	6	20
Alay Eminy (Major)	900	5	15
Bimbashee (Chef de Bat.)	750	4	8
Sagh Col Aghassy (Adj. Maj.)	400	3½	3
Sol. Col. Aghassy (Adjutant)	400	2½	3
Yuzbashee (Captain)	180	2	2
Mulazims (Lieutenant)	120	1½	2
Tchiaoushe (Serjeant)	40
Onbashee (Corporal)	30
Drum-major	40
Clerk	150
Chaplain	60
Private	20

3 Aspers=1 Para; 40 Paras=1 Piastre; 15 Piastres=1 Spanish Dollar; 73½ to 75 Piastres=One Pound Sterling. It is supposed that the piastre was originally worth a Spanish dollar, 4s. 4d.; but the false policy pursued by the Sultans in debasing the coinage has caused its present diminution of value. Even twenty years back, the pound sterling was only worth 12 piastres, and the exchange is now at 73½!

An Oka in weight nearly equals three pounds English.

Upon taking into consideration the trifling expenses of the Turkish officers, as compared with those of other armies, it would appear that they are extremely well paid: their uniforms cost but little; their lodging is provided at the public expense; and they receive a most ample allowance of provisions. By thus appealing to their interests, Mahmoud has made sure of their services; and although the expense of the new army is very heavy, the money so disbursed has placed a power in his hands which it is not unlikely that he may be obliged to wield, sooner or later, to defend himself against his people. The annual cost of the regulars is estimated at 40,000,000 piastres, (520,000*l.*).

MILITARY CODE.

Sultan Suleiman, when he reformed the corps of Janissaries and restored them to their ancient discipline, issued a code of laws for their guidance; and Mahmoud, finding that many of them were applicable to the present state of his army, grounded thereon his articles of war. The officers are held responsible for the discipline and good conduct of their men, and at the same time are admonished not to treat them with harshness. Such, however, are the despotic habits of the Turks, that the soldier would find himself a mere slave in the hands of his officer, were it not for a clause in the military regulations, authorizing him to complain to the Asker Nazirÿ and Seraskier, should he deem that he has been treated with injustice; and this regulation will, I doubt not, contribute much to ameliorate the moral condition of the Ottoman soldier.

Courts-martial have not yet been introduced; nor is it probable that they will for some time, as they are at variance with the despotism of Mahmoud, and might interfere with the promptness of his measures. Officers of high rank are punished for neglect of duty by banishment or degradation; the inferior officers are likewise liable to be reduced to the ranks; and the soldiers are kept in order through fear of the old Turkish argument—the bastinado. If the punishment of death were to be inflicted on those who deserted their colours during the last campaign, it would be necessary to exterminate the greatest portion of the army; but as the case was so common, it became a fruitless task to punish any of the fugitives, and their misconduct remained unnoticed.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

for it at the expense of Government; but the money appropriated to that purpose seldom goes beyond the pocket of the Commissary, and the soldier is then supported by the forced contributions of those whom he is sent to defend. There are large stores of provisions at Constantinople, and the troops quartered there are always well supplied; but the farther they are removed from the eye of the Sultan, the more are they liable to be neglected and plundered. The soldiers at the capital receive two meals a-day, consisting of soup, meat, bread, and vegetables; and on Friday (the Mahomedan sabbath) they are supplied with a "Pilaff," which may be considered as the national dish of the East.

The irregular troops, being obliged to serve at their own expense, are left to feed themselves as well as they can; and as they are in the habit of considering all the country north of Constantinople as the source whence they are to draw their supplies, the wretched inhabitants of Roumelia and Bulgaria, however distant they may be from the actual seat of war, suffer quite as much as if their provinces formed the arena for the combatants. Their houses are ransacked, their cattle are driven away, their remonstrances are treated with derision, or silenced by a blow ; and when a few years' peace have enabled them to recover from their poverty, another war breaks out — the same scenes are repeated, and the unhappy peasant feels that his only relief from bondage is in death. But it is not alone the country people who suffer by this marauding system,—the soldiers in turn feel the effects of their wantonness. Long before the termination of the campaign, they find the greatest difficulty in obtaining a coarse and scanty provision ; even this often fails. Many of them die literally from want ; and the irregular force ceases to be effective.

In the process of time, when Mahmoud, by increasing his regular force, is enabled to dispense with the services of the irregulars, these evils, we should think, would in part disappear ; and as the advantages of having a good commissariat must display themselves to him, in the event of another war, when he will have to move large bodies of disciplined troops, there can be no doubt but that he will pay more attention to this branch of his military system.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

The Turks at all times have been ready to acknowledge the superiority of Europeans in the science of medicine; and, notwithstanding their predestination, there are no people upon earth who place more faith in the skill and knowledge of a physician. It is therefore singular that they should hitherto have depended almost solely upon strangers for the welfare of their bodies, and not have made more progress in the study themselves. The physicians who attend the Sultan and his harem are Europeans; and there is scarcely a Pasha in the empire who has not some Greek or Italian adventurer attached to his court, whose knowledge of medicine is acquired much in the same manner as that of the learned Hakim, described in that best of Oriental pictures—"Anastasius." Mahmoud, however, has not allowed the medical department of his army to escape unnoticed; and, in furtherance of its improvement, he has established a College of Medicine, where young Turks alone are admitted and instructed in medicine and French.

The Hakim Bashee has the control of the medical department, and each regiment has a

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

acknowledge their inferiority, and seek for a remedy. This could only be found by borrowing from the infidels those lights which they had acquired, whilst the Moslems slept ; and it was not difficult for the Porte to find instructors in officers belonging to such European nations as were anxious to check the encroachments of Austria and Russia upon the Turkish empire. But the great obstacle to improvement existed in the prejudices of the Ottomans ; and Monsieur de Bonneval, a French officer, who was one of the first to undertake the arduous task, failed in his object from ignorance of the character of the people he had to deal with : his anxiety to succeed led him to expect results when he had not made a beginning ; and the artillery remained in their backward state until the Baron de Tott, in 1770, offered his services to the Porte. He found every thing in the greatest disorder ; and to fully comprehend the difficulty of his task, it is necessary to read his amusing memoirs. Every obstacle that prejudice or jealousy could invent was sedulously thrown in his way ; and the instances he relates of the schemes planned by his enemies are truly amusing.

On one occasion, he brought some field-pieces to exercise before the Grand Vizir ; and in lieu of a sponge, substituted hogs' bristles; and this occurrence was instantly pointed out by his enemies as a wish to insult the religious prejudices of the people; but having made them acknowledge that their mosques were painted with brushes made of the same materials, he begged to know what objection there could be to his using them in the service of the country:—and the fanatics, who were preparing to murder him, exclaimed, “God is wonderful!” and quietly permitted him to continue.

There were some mortars and shells in the arsenal, but the artillerymen knew not how to use them: and when he desired them to try, they placed the shell in first, and the powder afterwards. They knew not how to bore cannon until De Tott instructed them; and were so careless of the manner in which they obeyed the orders of the Sultan, that fifty pieces of field-artillery, which were to be sent to the army, were embarked without carriages, and consequently proved useless to the combatants.—The Topejees, or artillerymen, at this time consisting of forty thousand men, were quite devoid of discipline, and, like the Janissaries, scattered throughout the empire; they were not paid with regularity, and but few of them actually served.

To attempt the re-organization of such a body as this at once would have been madness; and De Tott therefore limited himself to the disciplining of six hundred men, who were formed into a separate corps, and styled saratchis, or diligent. Their pay was issued weekly; they submitted with docility to the lessons of their master; and before long, De Tott taught them to fire several times in a minute. This was a wonderful change in people who formerly thought that if they fired a gun once an hour, it was very good practice. De Tott likewise assisted the Turks in their knowledge of mathematics; and when he departed from the country, left them in a state of improvement. Since then, many French officers were employed in ameliorating the state of the artillery, until the dethronement of Selim, when a stagnation took place in improvement, until lately.

As it was to the exertions of the Topejees that Mahmoud owed the defeat of the Janissaries, he rewarded their fidelity by retaining them on the same footing as formerly, making only some trifling alterations in their dress; but it is said that he intends to give them the same organization as the infantry. At the present moment they are divided into three corps—

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

horses by the Government ; and the forage allowed to each horse is nine pounds of barley, and twelve pounds of chopped straw per diem. The stables were in very bad order ; the horses appeared to be badly groomed ; and the harness was dirty : the saddles are in imitation of the Cossack saddle, and, though weighing twenty pounds, are not badly adapted for service.

The uniform of the horse artillery is a red jacket embroidered, blue trowsers, clumsy boots, and the fez : they are most slovenly and unsoldier-like in their appearance.

FOOT ARTILLERY.

The Topejees, or foot artillery, at present are said to be six thousand five hundred strong ; and, although their new organization has not yet taken place, the Sultan purposes before long to form them into regiments. Their pay and allowances are the same as the guards, and their dress is of a similar fashion, except that their jackets are of a brown colour.

BOMBARDIERS AND MINERS.

This corps amounts to two thousand men ; they are quite undisciplined, and dressed in a most extraordinary manner; but to this attire they are much attached, and I should say, that they retained more of the leaven of former days, than is compatible with the march of reformation. Of their qualifications, it was not in my power to judge; but it seems unlikely that they should be versed in the scientific branches of their profession, since even the practical part of it is neglected. Their gun-carriages, platforms, and ammunition carts, were in a shameful state, and quite unfit for service.

Until lately, it was customary to leave the same artillerymen quartered for many years in the forts of the Dardanelles and frontier towns; and the consequences were, that they married and settled themselves for life in those spots, which they with justice might consider their home. Thus a large portion of the artillery force was quite nominal; and when their posts were attacked, no gunners were forthcoming; but this plan has been abolished by the Sultan; and his troops are no longer to be kept stationary.

The education of the artillery officers was hitherto quite neglected; but a college has been established, where they are to be instructed.

CANNON FOUNDRIES.

The only foundries established for casting cannon are at the capital; they are three in number: one, of two furnaces, is attached to the military arsenal at Tophana; the second, likewise of two furnaces, is near the naval arsenal; and the third, of one furnace, is at Hassquiou, the bombardier barracks.

The officer who had charge of the foundry near the arsenal was extremely obliging, and conducted me all round the works; but the establishment was in great disorder, and the artificers had all been discharged, as they had no materials to work with. In the two furnaces at this establishment, sufficient metal can be melted to cast from five to seven guns at a time; but the tools are of the coarsest kind; the labour is all manual, and it requires seven days to finish one gun. Shells also are cast at this establishment, and they can make as many as one thousand four hundred daily: the workmen are Turks and Armenians.

When I was leaving the foundry, I offered the officer a present of money, as is customary in Turkey; but this he declined, and begged me to believe that he felt most happy in having

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

and twenty can be made daily, the supply is not found sufficient, and the troops are mostly armed with muskets purchased at Marseilles. Sultan Selim first commenced the manufacture of gunpowder at Constantinople ; and there are now two powder-mills, one near St. Stephano, and the other at Azatli ; but the powder is not so strong as that made in Christendom.

BARRACKS.

There are eight handsome barracks in and around Constantinople, which have been built either by Mahmoud or Sultan Selim : they are equal to any structures of the kind in Europe, and are undoubtedly the most splendid buildings in Constantinople. They are thus divided :

No.	Names.	No. of Men in each
2	Pera	5000
1	Daoud Pasha ..	18,000
1	Ramah Chiflic ..	16,000
1	The Seraskiers ..	5000
1	Tophana	2000
1	Scutari	24,000
1	Hassquiou	2000
8	Total	72,000

I have given the number of men they were said to be capable of containing ; but I am convinced that the statement is very greatly exaggerated. The rooms in the barracks are small, and their men are more crowded than we should consider healthy ; but the rooms were clean, and each soldier had a wooden stretcher on which to spread the carpet that constitutes his bed.

Some of the barracks were much dilapidated, and not half occupied by the reduced garrison now at the capital.

COLLEGES.

Sultan Mahmoud has lately established four Colleges, or Schools, at Constantinople ; namely, of Medicine, of the Marine, of Music, and of Military Instruction. The first contains one hundred students, who are making a rapid progress ; and between three and four hundred young men are instructed at the Military College, which is under the superintendance of the chief bombardier : their studies are mathematics, the elements of fortification, &c. Some few French works upon military subjects have been translated into Turkish, and such officers as can read are obliged to study them.

The prejudices of the Turks have hitherto effectually prevented any improvement in the education of their youth, as they deemed that a Moslem who could speak a foreign language was little better than an apostate; but Mahmoud, at the beginning of the year, broke through this ridiculous fancy, and issued a firman by which he authorized his subjects to proceed to France and England for the purpose of receiving instruction. When this edict was notified to the students at the colleges, they received it with great delight, and many instantly volunteered to be amongst the number sent. It was said that one hundred young men were to proceed to France, and as many to England; but it does not appear that this plan has yet been put into execution. Since the Turks will not submit to serve under Christian officers, it is only by acquiring, in a Christian country, the knowledge we possess,* that they can hope ever to ameliorate their condition; and Mahmoud should therefore hasten to avail

* The Turks have made but little progress in the science of fortification since the year 1770, when a Pasha, who undertook to fortify the Dardanelles, built the walls of his fort extremely high, and then whitewashed them, in order that the Russians might see them a long way off, and be aware that he was ready to give battle!

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Second, her enemies now use it with great effect against her. Thus, during the last campaign, the Turks had always worse information than the Russians; clouds of Cossacks scoured the country; and this command of the communication gave Diebitsch a vast superiority during the campaign, and enabled him to surprise the Vizir at Kuleftscha, and to mask his march across the Balkan, so that those troops sent to intercept him, always arrived too late. The Khans of the Crimea were most useful tributaries of the Porte, and were ready at all times to take the field with fifty thousand horse. Crim Gueray, in 1769, had three armies of horse, amounting severally to a hundred thousand, sixty thousand, and forty thousand men; and these troops cost him nothing, as they served without pay, and no preparations were made to supply them with food. Ten pounds of millet, roasted, pounded, and pressed together, suspended to the saddle of every Noguais, furnished the troops with certain provisions for fifty days; the horses foraged for themselves; and as they required but little care, many of the Tartars had two or three.

When in line of battle, the Tartar force formed twenty deep; and when in column, they were divided into companies, of forty men, four abreast.

The Crim-Tartars possessed all the qualities requisite for an irregular soldier : they were hardy, accustomed to support fatigue and privation, brave, inured to riding from their childhood, and obedient to their leaders. They were far superior to the Timariots, who had become enervated by peaceful habits; and the loss of the Crimea, and consequently of these troops, inflicted an irreparable injury on the military resources of Turkey.

The irregular cavalry is now drawn principally from the Asiatic provinces; but as the Mahomedan population has much decreased, this force is consequently less numerous than formerly. The Sultan, during the Russian war, formed several regiments from the irregular cavalry, and when they were partially disciplined, sent them to the army, where they fought with credit, and often proved troublesome to the Russian advanced-guards; but at the conclusion of hostilities they were disbanded, and allowed to return to their homes.

War is far from being popular with them, as they are obliged to furnish their own horses and arms; and it often happens that they return with neither.

INFANTRY.

The irregular infantry called "Seimens," is raised by the Pashas, Ayans, Monsselims, and Vaivodes; and during the last war some irregular regiments were paid by the Porte: the men were drawn from Roumelia and Asia; and of those who behaved well before the enemy, the majority were ex-janissaries, but who were not imbued with the maxims and prejudices of their former corps. I cannot presume to offer an opinion as to the numerical force of the Ottoman Empire, the spirit of Janissarism being still latent in a large portion of the population; but there is every reason to believe that it is much less than we have hitherto supposed. In the European provinces, the Christian inhabitants are three times more numerous than the Mussulmans; and in Asia, the country is very thinly peopled. It is unnecessary to enter into any farther details relative to the irregular troops; they are merely an armed rabble, and their qualities have often been fully discussed by former writers.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

shore, had still left the Christians masters of the seas.*

Mahomet the Second may be considered the creator of the Ottoman navy; but on so small a scale were his first efforts, that when he attacked Constantinople, his fleet consisted of only eighteen galleys and some open boats, badly constructed, and manned by sailors who dreaded the element they were destined to act upon. The approach of five Christian ships bearing succours to the besieged city, afforded the Ottomans an opportunity of trying their skill in maritime warfare; but their attacks were ill directed, and the defence made by their enemies was so desperate, that after three fruitless attempts to carry the ships by boarding, they were forced to retire with the loss of several thousand men, leaving the sea open to their opponents.

The capture of Constantinople was however materially aided by the agency of the Turkish flotilla; and when Mahomet had firmly established his throne amidst the fragments of that of the Cæsars, he found no difficulty in improving the condition of his infant marine. His new Greek subjects, or slaves, were forced to display the science they possessed for the service of their imperious master; and the talent and labour which, if properly employed, might have postponed the downfall of their country, was now made to rivet her chains. The mercenary disposition of the Genoese, and their hatred to Venice, rendered them willing allies of the Sultan, with whose aid they hoped to humble the power of their rival republic; and they foresaw that, without a navy, it would be impossible for the Turks to lop her limbs by seizing Candia and her other insular possessions.

* Gibbon, à Cantemir, &c.

Thus, in a few years, the Turkish navy made a rapid progress towards perfection. The Venetians were soon expelled from the Sea of Marmora; and, not content with guarding their own coasts, the Ottoman ships ranged the Mediterranean Sea in search of adventures; and, by occasional descents on the shores of their enemies, caused constant alarm to the inhabitants of the coasts, whilst they remunerated themselves by ample spoils in treasure and slaves. Conflicts occasionally took place between the Ottoman and Venetian squadrons; at times with a dubious result, but generally terminating to the advantage of the latter; and it was not until the notorious Hayraddin Barbarossa assumed the command of the Ottoman navy, that it could be considered capable of giving battle to the Christian fleets, with any certainty of success.

Hayraddin Barbarossa was one of those extraordinary beings who, had he been born in another clime, and possessed a mind tempered by education, would have been considered in the light of a hero; but the courage which made him undertake the most hazardous enterprises, and the judgment which ensured him success, served but to raise him from the lowest station in a band of pirates, to become their head; and the natural ferocity of his character, whilst it kept his followers within the bounds of submission, attached such odium to his memory, that the deeds of the Ottoman Capitan Pasha are forgotten in the atrocities committed by the corsair.

The improvement caused in the Ottoman fleets by the appointment of Barbarossa to the command, may be explained in a few words: he was a sailor!—he had been inured to the sea from his childhood—the waves had no terrors for him; and, whether at sea or on shore, he had still the same bold unflinching heart and decisive judgment.

Hitherto, admirals had been appointed to the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

as their own, and upon emergency they could always man their fleets with the hardy inhabitants of the Istrian and Dalmatian coasts. The Genoese still retained their predilection for maritime enterprise; Spain and France likewise possessed a naval force; and Malta, ever engaged in war with the Infidels, formed a nursery for the aspiring Christian youth, who in those days used to seek for fame and distinction wherever hostilities were raging. But until the improvement of navigation had abolished the use of galleys, a strange anomaly existed in the maritime warfare of the Christians and Turks; the unfortunate slaves, who were doomed to work at the oar, being, on most occasions, the countrymen of those whom they were accessory in combating; and the contending parties were certain that every shot they fired was as likely to kill one of their own faith, as to take effect on an Infidel: when, however, the progress of science found a substitute for manual labour, by the adaptation of sails to ships, the Christian fleets ceased to be encumbered with prisoners, although the Turks still retained their slaves, and often chained them to the guns they were to work.

The celebrated battle of Lepanto, in 1571,

formed a great epoch, not only in Turkish naval history, but also in that of the Christian powers connected with the Mediterranean,—it may be considered as the period from whence dates the introduction of heavy artillery into their ships, and the consequent disuse of galleys, the victory having principally been obtained by the continued fire of five large ships, which, like as many fortresses, protected the front of the Christian line. Five hundred ships and galleys were on this day engaged; and, after a tremendous contest, victory sided with Don John of Austria. The Turks, out of two hundred and thirty galleys, had thirty sunk, twenty-five burnt, and one hundred and thirty captured; twenty-five thousand Turks were killed, eight thousand taken prisoners, and fifteen thousand Christian slaves released. The allies lost fifteen ships, and ten thousand men. When we reflect that, one hundred and eighteen years previous to this, the Turks were quite ignorant of naval affairs, and unable to compete with five Christian galleys in the Sea of Marmora, we cannot refuse them some praise for the rapidity with which they created a naval force; and their celerity in re-assembling two hundred sail, immediately after the battle of Lepanto, proves their resources to have been immense: however, from this moment, their maritime power declined, although it still was able to compete with Venice, and to wrest from her Candia, in addition to Cyprus, and other Greek islands; but Venice had already begun to sink under the enervating influence of her degenerate nobility; and the peace of Passarowitz, in 1718, struck the last blow to her supremacy in the Mediterranean.

The Turks now ceased to use galleys as ships of war, and, in imitation of the Christian powers, constructed ships, and armed them according to modern principles; but of what service were the mere ships without the hands to work them?—and what advantage could those derive from the compass, who scarcely knew the cardinal points, and were perfectly ignorant of geography? In fact, the same causes which effected the defeat of the Turkish armies on the frontiers of Hungary, at this period, likewise acted upon their naval system. Science had made rapid strides in Europe, whilst in Turkey she was dormant; and when at last the Ottomans perceived that they were left in the background, they hoped at once to supply their deficiencies by imitating the mechanical improve-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

time weakness, their bitterest enemy, Catherine, did not overlook the opportunity it gave her of forwarding her interests in the Mediterranean ; and in 1770, the Turks were struck with consternation on hearing that a Russian fleet had landed troops in Greece, and sailed up to the Dardanelles. This intelligence roused them from their lethargy ; but it was already too late : the Russian fleet, though nominally commanded by Count Orloff, was actually directed by Admirals Elphinstone and Greig, experienced English sailors, and the crews were already accustomed to the sea. The Turks had neither officers nor sailors ; and, although treble the strength of the Russian squadron, their fleet, after a sharp engagement, in which the Capitan Pacha's ship blew up, anchored in the harbour of Tchesmé, near Scio, and waited, in a crowded position, the renewed attacks of the enemy. The result did credit to the gallantry and skill of the Russian commanders, who, directing four fire-ships upon the Ottoman fleet, had the satisfaction of seeing it soon enveloped in flames. Fifteen line-of-battle ships were destroyed, besides many smaller vessels ; and the Russians only lost the ship bearing Admiral Spiridon's flag, which was blown up with the Turkish admiral's.

One man, however, escaped from the defeat, to whom the Turkish navy eventually owed its restoration—this was Hassan, the captain of the Capitan Pasha's ship, who, although on board during the explosion, escaped uninjured, and succeeded in swimming to the shore. He was appointed to replace the Capitan Pasha, who was put to death by order of the Sultan, and in his hands the navy soon assumed a more respectable footing; new ships were built, the old vessels repaired, the arsenals replenished, and many of those abuses which had crept into the management of the navy abolished. Hassan's courage was unbounded, and approached to rashness, but it served to restore the confidence of his men; and a bold and successful attack made by him upon the Russians in the island of Lemnos, served to establish the fame his preceding measures had obtained for him. He was not always equally fortunate; the Prince of Nassau having defeated his flotilla off Oczakoff, in the summer of 1788, where he lost eight ships and two thousand men; and in a second engagement, four sail of the line, some frigates, and three thousand men. Hassan was subsequently employed in Egypt and Bessarabia, where he displayed considerable talents as a general.

After his death, the Ottoman navy again

became proverbial for its inefficiency ; and we do not hear that it made any figure in the Mediterranean, until the occupation of Egypt by the French, and the subsequent disembarkation of the British army in 1800, when a considerable fleet sailed from Constantinople to further the success of the common cause. But Selim now occupied the Ottoman throne, and this enlightened prince had too much discernment not to perceive the necessity of forming a force capable of co-operating with his armies, and which would render his decrees respected by his distant tributaries, who, in the absence of the means to enforce them, treated the firmans of the Sultan with neglect or derision ; he therefore did not allow his navy to remain neglected. In 1807, when the British squadron effected the passage of the Dardanelles, the Turkish fleet at Constantinople alone consisted of twelve ships of the line, two of which were three-deckers, nine frigates, and many smaller vessels ; and of these, our squadron burnt or destroyed one sixty-four, four frigates, three corvettes, one brig, and two gun-boats.

Enough, however, still remained to encounter the Russian squadron in the Black Sea (which, since the battle of Tchesmé, had been the scene

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

but their courage did not supply the deficiency of their discipline, and they fell a prey to the well-combined attack of the Allied fleet.

The Russian war in 1829, and the following year, had no effect upon the Ottoman navy: they lost a corvette and captured a frigate, but no engagement took place.

Having now summed up the leading features of Turkish naval history, I shall proceed to describe the actual state of the Ottoman fleet; premising, however, that, as a landsman, it is with diffidence that I touch upon the subject of a profession foreign to my own; and I therefore only pretend to give a slight sketch of its condition.

PRESENT STATE OF THE OTTOMAN NAVY.

It may truly be said of Constantinople, that the whole of the Ottoman empire is concentrated there; for, notwithstanding the capabilities of its distant provinces, every thing that relates to the army, navy, or civil government, emanates from, and is matured at, the capital.

The Sultan is afraid to trust the execution of any plan to subordinate agents, well knowing that, under his own superintendence alone, can he hope to see his projects realized: thus the army, as I have before observed, is to be seen to the greatest advantage at Constantinople, where its materiel is organized; and the dockyards and arsenals of the Ottoman fleet are likewise all established on the shore of the Golden Horn.

No situation in the world can be better adapted for the purpose,—the Bosphorus and Dardanelles afford an easy passage to either the Black or Mediterranean Seas, and give the Turks a great advantage over the Russians, if they chose to avail themselves of it, since it is in their power to concentrate their naval force, and attack either of the Russian squadrons with a superior fleet: but they are too ignorant of their own strength to know how it may be best applied.

The harbour of Constantinople, also called the “Golden Horn,” is a branch of the Bosphorus, about five hundred yards in width, and running inland for nearly three miles, when it receives the waters of a small stream flowing from the northward. The right shore of the port is hemmed in by the walls of Constantinople, extending from Seraglio Point to where the harbour terminates, and on the opposite bank are the suburbs of Galata, Pera, the naval arsenal, and Hassquiou. There is sufficient depth of water in every part of the port for ships of the largest size; the sea is always perfectly smooth; the surrounding heights effectually screen it from every wind, and there is an abundance of fresh water. Nature seems to have made it expressly for a naval depôt, and to the Turks, such a harbour is invaluable; for it has spared them a great deal of trouble, as it never requires to be cleared out or deepened.

When I arrived at Constantinople, the remnants of the Ottoman fleet were anchored in the Bosphorus off Buyukderé, but shortly afterwards they sailed into the port, for the purpose of being laid up for the winter months; and when I left, in December, they were all moored close to the arsenal, with their cutwaters touching the shore, and their bowsprits projecting over the quay. One frigate anchored in the port as guard-ship, and a frigate and a brig sailed with Halil Pasha, the ambassador to Russia.

The Ottoman fleet now consists of the Mahmoud, 120 guns; Selim, (flag-ship) 80; five line-of-battle ships, mounting 74 guns each; four frigates, five corvettes, one brig, two steamboats, at Constantinople: one line-of-battle ship, fourteen frigates and corvettes; which ships escaped from Navarin, &c. on their way from

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

remarks were correct ; for, in the present state of the Turkish navy, it is impossible to expect that such a ship as the Mahmoud could be properly worked. It must, however, be acknowledged, that the Turks are apt imitators of our system, and have profited much by the example of his Majesty's ships Blonde and Rifleman, which were anchored at Constantinople during six months. Previous to their arrival, the Turkish men-of-war were in great disorder ; but the contrast presented by the appearance of our frigates induced them to alter the trim of their own vessels, and their external appearance latterly was very respectable.

The arrival of the British and French men-of-war conveying the Ambassadors was quite an event at Constantinople, many years having passed since a foreign frigate had been seen in the Bosphorus ; and even on this occasion, (to comply with the orders prohibiting the admission of men-of-war within the outer castles,) our ships were obliged to conceal their guns, as a matter of form, when passing the Dardanelles ; but after they had anchored at Terapia, opposite to the Sultan's summer palace, they again ran their guns out. At this period the sandjac sheriff, or standard of Mahomet, was in the Sultan's keeping at Terapia ; and when his Highness determined upon taking the field in person, he directed that the sacred standard should be transferred from Terapia to the camp at Ramah Chiffic.

In former days, whenever a ceremony of this kind occurred, it was dangerous for a Christian to be seen near the holy relic, lest he should cast his profane eyes upon it; but such is the toleration of Mahmoud, that he felt highly flattered by H.M.S. Blonde and Rifleman firing a salute when the ceremonies took place. Captain Hugon's frigate, the Armide, did not salute; and Mahmoud, having inquired the reason, was informed that her guns pointed towards the palace, and would consequently have incommoded him. On another occasion, when the Sultan passed our ships in his barge, Captains Lyon and Mitchell manned their yards, and gave him three cheers; a compliment which pleased Mahmoud so much, that he directed a handsome present to be divided amongst the crews.

The Capitan Pasha made repeated visits to our men-of-war, and closely examined all their details, with the view of adopting them in his own ships: he is a person of some merit, although his education was not such as to qualify him for the important post he now occupies, which is tantamount to that of Lord High Admiral; but Fortune dispenses her favours in so capricious a manner in Turkey, that the origin of the greatest statesman must not be inquired into, if we expect to hear either of noble birth or liberal education.

The Capitan Pasha is one instance in many of the whimsical selections made by the Sultans for the post of High Admiral. His early education was limited to the knowledge of slipper-making, and for some years he plied away at his trade, little dreaming that he was destined to occupy the important situation he now fills. He however became weary of private life and papoushes, and commenced his public career as a subordinate police-officer at Pera and Galata, where he was well known to several of the residents. But although his situation was insignificant, it gave him a share of power, and a footing in the government; and, by degrees, rising from one post to another, and acquiring his knowledge of naval science from an occasional glance at the merchant vessels anchored off Galata, and his practical experience of the ocean from his voyages in a light caique across the port from Tophana to Istamboul, he at last was considered fit to hold the post of Capitan Pasha, which he has hitherto filled in a manner cre-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

gentleman who accompanied the Capitan Pasha during one of his cruises, described him as passing his time in witnessing the buffoonery of some of his crew. One day, whilst idling in this manner, he inquired how British admirals amused themselves. The other replied, that “British admirals devoted that time to the care of their ships and discipline of their crews, which he employed in amusement;” and this answer surprised and annoyed his Excellency very much. The Capitan Pasha, on his first assumption of office, was a strict follower of the Mahomedan laws, and once directed an attendant, who offered him wine, to be severely punished; but all that is now changed, and he drinks champagne, and other forbidden juices, with as much zest, and in as great a quantity, as any infidel in Christendom. A handsome palace, within the naval arsenal, is appropriated to the use of the Capitan Pasha; and he there transacts business daily, assisted by his kiaya, or lieutenant. The naval arsenal is under his control. *

* The Capitan Pasha died lately, and has been succeeded by Halil Pasha, the late ambassador to Russia.

TURKISH SAILORS.

Until lately, a kind of marine corps existed, from whence crews were taken for the fleet; but the galionjees, as they were called, are now abolished, and a new system is about to be organized. Previous to the Greek Revolution, the Ipsariots, Spezziots, and Hydriots, formed the effective strength of the Ottoman navy; and whilst the work aloft was left to their management, the Turks did duty at the guns; but, now that the Greeks have thrown off their allegiance, it has become necessary for the Turks to perform both tasks, and it is not likely that they will succeed as well as their active rayahs. They, however, work their guns extremely well; and when Sir Pulteney Malcolm visited the Capitan Pasha's flag-ship at Buyukderé, they fired with a rapidity and regularity not to be excelled: but it must be remembered that the "Selim" was at anchor in smooth water, and that it is probable their practice would not be so perfect at sea.

It is the Sultan's intention to form a naval corps, regularly officered, and dressed in an uniform similar in make to that of the land forces; but these arrangements were not complete in December last; a handsome barrack adjoining the arsenal is intended for the men, and they are to be well paid and clothed. A naval college also has been established.

The Turkish ships are usually too much crowded, and the number of men only serves to embarrass their movements at sea, and cause them a heavy loss when in action: no attention is paid to the cleanliness of the crew; and the ships are consequently in a most filthy state. There is no doubt but that a rapid improvement may take place in the internal arrangements of the Ottoman navy, for the materials at Mahmoud's disposal are much the same as those with which Mahmoud Ali has effected so much in Egypt. His navy is in excellent order; and a man-of-war brig which came to Constantinople with some treasure for the Sultan, was quite perfect in all her details. Her decks were clean, the hammocks* of the men were ranged in the nettings, her yards well squared, and ropes taut, and at sunset she lowered her royal yards very smartly, whilst the Turkish frigate alongside was twice as long in performing the same feat.

* The Turkish sailors sleep upon carpets spread on the deck.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of day barely penetrates into this abode of wretchedness; and the spectator is impressed with a feeling of utter horror, when he recollects that few of the unhappy beings who enter here are ever released, except by the devastating influence of the plague, which has often converted this crowded den into a solitude.

“ Those who enter here must leave all hope behind.” The innocent victim of tyrannical persecution is perhaps chained to a wretch whose life may have been disgraced by every crime; yet he cannot separate from his companion, and must remain linked to him until death severs his bonds. There were happily but few prisoners in the Bagnio when I visited it; but some of these were pitiable objects: they were Bulgarians, who had been imprisoned for attempting to emigrate from their country to Russia — their clothes were in rags, their beards and hair were long and matted, and the attenuated appearance of many betokened that the food they procured barely sufficed to support life. Two of these unfortunate men cast themselves at our feet, and supplicated for our interference; but we could only pity them — their doom was unalterable. Several of the prisoners were employed on the public works; but in the chamber some unhappy wretches were stretched on the filthy floor, apparently dying. There is a small chapel adjoining, whither we were conducted by two Greek priests, through some dark passages. The light from a taper displayed to us the usual tawdry assemblage of saints painted round the walls, and in their name the priests asked us for charity. The mite thus received from strangers was all they had to live upon; for they were prisoners, and considered themselves fortunate in having escaped from the massacres of their sect. In the yard of the Bagnio are a small mosque, a range of shops, and a bath. At the door of the latter stood a handsome young Moslem, whose person was cleanly, and countenance so animated, that we should not have supposed him to be a prisoner but for the iron ring round one of his ankles. His cheerfulness corresponded so little with his situation, that we called him to us, and inquired what had caused his incarceration. He laughed whilst he related his tale; from which it appeared, that, in common with all other Turks, he enrolled himself when a boy as a janissary, and had been marked on the arm, as was customary. He however had no participation in their revolt; but, happening one day to be very drunk, was discovered by the patrol lying senseless in the streets, and the janissary marks having betrayed him as one of the proscribed sect, he was forthwith carried to the Bagnio. When he awoke from his drunken sleep, he found himself in irons, in this fearful prison, where he had now been confined many months, but hoped soon to be released, as they had discovered him to be innocent of treasonable practices, and, as a preliminary step to his liberation, had knocked off his chains. Near the Bagnio, there is a range of store-houses; and moored in front of these are a few brigs and polaccas, captured from the Greeks at Ipsara: there is also an old galley of forty oars, said to have been taken from the Knights of Malta; but this relic of former days is so rotten, that it will before long share the fate of a similar prize, which sunk at its moorings a short time ago.

NAVAL ARTILLERY.

The Turkish ships are armed with brass guns. The method of casting iron is not yet understood by their artificers. The gun-carriages are clumsy, and none of the guns that I saw had sights; but I suppose that the Turks have now adopted them, in imitation of those they saw on board our frigates.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Bahar, is a small battery, on a height, and called "Eski Sarlek," but this work is open to the rear; and beyond this, on the Asiatic shore, at "Pointe des Barbiers," is the Kippis Boorum battery, likewise undefended towards the interior. From thence there are no works, until where the channel, being not more than five hundred yards in width, is commanded on either shore by the fortresses properly called the Dardanelles. The Killit Bahar, on the European shore, is completely overlooked by a hill that rises behind it, and from whence musketry might be fired upon the garrison of the fortress; this hill is not fortified, and the possession of it would ensure the immediate fall of the castle. The Sultanié Kalessie, on the opposite bank, is likewise commanded by this hill; but it may be considered the strongest work of all the fortresses, the country around being level and marshy. It was from the guns of these two forts that our squadron suffered so much in 1807. The distance from the Dardanelles to Abydos is about four miles, and the intervening coast is lined with batteries, which cross their fire; whilst those at Sestos and Abydos bear down the stream; none of these works are, however, susceptible of defence, except Abydos, which is walled round, but is not capable of making a long resistance.

SKETCH OF THE DARDANELLES

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS
Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Never be without a book!

Forgotten Books Full Membership gives universal access to 797,885 books from our apps and website, across all your devices: tablet, phone, e-reader, laptop and desktop computer

A library in your pocket for $8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Making an enormous total of eight mortars and eight hundred and fourteen guns. Amongst the latter, at Sultanié Kalessie, there are seventeen which carry stone balls twenty-four inches in diameter, and one of twenty-six and a half inches. At Killit Bahar there are eighteen, and at Koom Kalé sixteen guns of similar size. The accompanying rough sketch points out the position of the batteries between the Dardanelles and Abydos.

DEFENCE OF THE BOSPHORUS.

The fortifications at the entrance of the Bosphorus are of a similar construction to those on the Hellespont; but here there is less danger to be apprehended from an attack. The coast offers no facilities for a disembarkation, and the mouth of the Bosphorus is (in sailors' parlance) very difficult to make. Northerly gales are of constant occurrence, and ships could not venture near the shore with that wind, as there is no harbour south of Bourgas. Reinforcements of men and ships might be sent from Constantinople to the forts on the Bosphorus within twenty-four hours; and even if Russia could land twenty or thirty thousand men, they would be overpowered by the armed population of the capital. The only spot where a debarkation might be effected near the castles, is at Kilia Kalessie; and between that village and the city is a tract of hilly ground, covered with forests, which it would be easy to defend. The Russians, however, are now too well acquainted with the road from Yassy to Constantinople to trouble themselves about any other mode of approaching that city, when they determine upon finally ejecting the Turks from Europe. In their hands, the defences of the Dardanelles will be more formidable than they are at present.

THE END.

LONDON :

PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLLEY, Dorset Street, Fleet Street.