

HAPPY ANNIVERSARY ... Vesper Society celebrated its 40th anniversary this month with a variety of events across the globe, culminating with a gala celebration last Saturday at the Stanford Faculty Club. The Bay Area based society was formed in 1965 as a consultancy to faith-related nonprofit health-care organizations.

ONE MORE TIME ... Palo Alto's second Curves center held a grand re-opening Sept. 27 at 4117 El Camino Real, Palo Alto. The franchise, which boasts a 30-minute fitness solution with a weight loss program, has two sites in the community.

NEW OWNERS ... The Red Rock Cafe, once a hangout for the Raging Grannies and a performance spot for folk singer Joan Baez, was recently purchased by the HighWay Community, a non-denominational Christian church whose headquarters is in the same building above the cafe. The Mountain View-based HighWay Community began about five years ago as an alternative worship service at the First Baptist Church of Los Altos, designed to "reflect the look and feel of Generation X," according to the group's Web site. It has since become a separate ministry with a wider audience. Its services, held Sundays at Palo Alto High School's Haymarket Theatre, draw from 400 to 500 people, church leaders said. Funds from Red Rock will not go to support the HighWay Community, according to church leaders.

A monthly section on local business news and trends, edited by Marc Burkhardt

Are We Losing Our Edge?

Silicon Valley led the pack in virtually all negative categories, with an average 6.86 on a scale of eight - an eight rating means immediate attention required.

by Jay Thorwaldson
Silicon Valley is losing the "best place to locate your business" race with other locations around the nation and world, according to the powerful Silicon Valley Leadership Group. While the valley and Palo Alto region are still the premier high-tech areas, other regions are rating higher in almost all "desirability" factors — from traffic congestion, livability and affordability to education of the overall workforce, the group warns.

Education, locally and statewide, is the most critical of all, according to speakers at a Sept. 6 Palo Alto forum sponsored by the group, formerly known the Silicon Valley Manufacturers' Association. The organization represents more than 200 of the leading corporations, investment firms and businesses in the Santa Clara County region.

Some of the problems — and solutions, if any — require statewide mobilization and effective action, Mark Baldassare of the Public Policy Institute of California said.

"We've heard many times that population growth, repeated budget shortfalls and dysfunctional planning" are damaging the economy, Baldassare told scores of attendees.

Backed by a Hewlett Foundation grant, the Institute and SVLG in 2003 launched a depth study of facilities and resources of the region compared to other areas.

On the basis of the study, "California hasn't yet reached a crisis," but trends and events are increasingly ominous, he said.

"Some things, we've found, are not as negative as they've been painted — for example, the population won't grow as fast as projected, and we've spent as much on infrastructure as anyone. "But things are not that rosy," he cautioned. By 2025, "we are going to add a population the size of Ohio," and the state has an "infrastructure backload" of aging and unrepaired facilities.

The state's debt load makes it difficult to finance projects. In terms of population the state is heading for a majority of Hispanic persons by 2011, and the 7 percent of the general population will be over 65.

"We will need greater education for the workforce," he said. But of even greater concern is that "projections are that we won't be able to meet the demand for working-age college graduates" to compete in a world market for high-tech development and manufacturing.

The "major implications" of lagging educational levels and the need for more highly educated workers will be that there will be a "chronically under-employed" population requiring more social and other services.

"Where will the tax revenues come from?" he asked.

"The big question is whether the state can and will make the investment necessary" to bring California back from near the bottom of educational expenditures per student nationwide, he said.

At the same time, by 2025 traffic congestion in urban areas "is likely to increase travel time by 48 percent," according to the Institute's projections.

"We say we'd rather 'manage demand' than build roads. But do we have the political will and public consensus to make the lifestyle changes necessary?"

Seven critical factors in deciding where to locate your company

Silicon Valley rates highest in downside factors relating to critical issues firms might consider when deciding where to locate or relocate, according to a new study by the Silicon Valley Leadership Group, a consortium of large firms in Palo Alto and Santa Clara County.

Comparisons were with Raleigh-Durham, NC, Fairfax County, Va., Boston, Mass., Seattle, Wash., Portland, Ore., Austin, Texas, and San Diego.

The "critical issues" included unemployment rates, housing affordability, costs of traffic congestion, eighth-grade math achievements (future education measurement), electricity costs, percent of population with health insurance and state tax rates.

Silicon Valley led the pack in virtually all "negative" categories, with an average 6.86 on a scale of eight — an eight rating means "immediate attention required."

Raleigh-Durham ranked first with a 2.59 average, followed by Fairfax County with a 3.29. Boston and Seattle tied for third, with averages of 3.86. Portland had a 4.14 average and Austin had a 4.29. San Diego average 5.71.

Silicon Valley received eight ratings in traffic congestion and eighth-grade math, seven ratings in unemployment rates and housing affordability and six ratings in the electricity costs, health insurance coverage and state tax rates. ■

He said both planning and transportation-improvement efforts "are hobbled by Californians' deep distrust in local or state governments." The bottom line, he said, is the question: "Are Californians willing to ask themselves the questions about the kind of life they want for themselves and their children?"

Panelists Ned Barnholdt, chairman emeritus of Agilent Technologies; Jude Barry, former chief of staff to San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzalez; and Tom McEnery, former San Jose mayor; agreed with Baldassare's projections and had warnings of their own.

Barnholdt warned that America's educational directions may be headed in the wrong direction of being dominated by standardized testing even if more funding could be found.

While serving on a government advisory board for Singapore, he learned that officials there became concerned that their engineering graduates were well-educated technically but "were not as creative" as those coming out of China's schools — their primary economic rival.

In response, "they introduced more studies of art and music to little kids and put less emphasis on tests. They found through their rigorous testing process they had...stifled the creative process in their kids," Barnholdt said.

"The scary thing is that China copies everything Singapore does, and spends a lot of effort trying to duplicate the magic that was the creation of Silicon Valley," Barnholdt said.

"That's scary," he repeated.

Baldassare cited the opposite trend in America's schools and warned that "we may have gone too far — kids and teachers feel they are being over-tested."

There is also a shortfall in the capacity to provide higher education to more students, he said, noting it took 17 years to get the latest University of California campus built in Merced.

McEnery said that in addressing education, the tax-limiting "Proposition 13 is like the elephant in the living room" of a dysfunctional family — no one wants to talk about it.

"No leader in California has either the standing or the courage to address that," McEnery said.

Barnholdt said the key question is, "How do you develop a long-term financial model" to accomplish what clearly needs to be done?

"We need to concentrate on education, education, education," McEnery summed up the consensus of the panel. "That's the basis of this valley; it's the basis of our country." ■

Population control advocate visits Palo Alto

Crush of people leading to greater problems, he argues

Nicholas Wright

John Seager, president and CEO of Population Connection

by Kenneth Seli

If it were up to John Seager, the world would be a lot less crowded.

Seager, the president and CEO of environmental advocacy group Population Connection, said many global problems have a direct correlation to recent population booms.

"It is literally impossible to not find a story about the impact of population in the news today," said Seager who sees a connection between changing weather patterns, availability of resources and fuel usage among other issues.

Currently, Seager is touring the West Coast, which included a stop in Palo Alto, to meet with supporters in California.

"They are of a globalist perspective," Seager said of the region. "They understand how connected the planet is today."

It is the boom of people on earth since the technological revolution that most concerns the members of Population Connection, Seager said.

James Holland Jones, assistant professor of anthropological science at Stanford University, said the current population of the earth experienced doubling in the mid to late 20th century from 3 billion to 6 billion people.

"The shortest doubling time of the world's population was in 35 years around the mid to late 20th century," Holland said.

Seager said Population Connection was formed because of the expected growth of the earth's population in relation to natural resources available.

Formerly known for most of its 35 years as the Zero Population Growth movement, the group seeks to educate the general populace on the benefit of a stable "replacement rate," in which a woman gives birth to two children, therefore replenishing the population without significantly adding onto it, Seager said.

The organization also supports the use of birth control and family planning.

Not everyone, however, feels the issue is so black and white.

William H. Durham, chair of anthropological sciences at Stanford University, said the population boom does play a major role in the world's condition. However, other factors also come into play.

"Growth and uneven consumption is growing faster than population growth," said Durham who points to increases of technology that burn through energy and resource supplies. "You have to be more concerned with institutional inequality because it has to do more with scarcity of resources."

Despite such factors, however, Seager said he is confident global environmental problems can be better addressed once population is under control.

"I'm wildly optimistic," Seager said. "When the right ingredients are in place, change will happen virtually overnight." ■
